CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

PART III.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From March 5, 1874, to April 11, 1874.]

been printed in the Book of Estimates; and when the appropriations of Congress are compared with the estimates, we must compare them with the whole, and not with a part. The gentleman was wholly wrong in his allegation. The appropriations made by Congress at the last session were far below the estimates.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me one question right there?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I expect to reply to the gentleman, and to prove all that I said; but right here I wish to ask him, is not this the truth, that we appropriated, including the sinking fund, $319,000,000 for the current fiscal year?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will excuse me for not answering that question now; I will answer it fully when I have finished my reply to the point now under discussion. I have just demonstrated the fact that in comparing the appropriations with the estimates the gentleman left out $23,000,000 of the estimates.

Mr. BECK. Very well; then I will ask one other question. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st of December last—December, 1873—in his Book of Estimates, page 175, states that all the estimates for the year 1874 were $308,323,256, while the gentleman himself has stated on this floor that the appropriations were $319,000,000; is not that true?

Mr. GARFIELD. This sum of $308,000,000 of which the gentleman speaks is what is found in the Book of Estimates only, and does not include the additional estimates which I have just referred to.

Mr. BECK. Ah, but this is the question: After all these deficiency bills were passed, on the 1st day of December, 1873, did not the Secretary of the Treasury in his Book of Estimates again repeat that all the estimates for the year 1874 were $308,000,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. He did not. In this year's Book of Estimates he states what his estimates were for 1874. But that statement is taken bodily, from millions down to cents, from the Book of Estimates of the previous year, which book was in print and on our tables on the first day of the session, in December, 1872. All this I pointed out to the gentleman in the debate some weeks ago.

Mr. BECK. I will say this, and then I will not interrupt the gentleman further. I will make good, when I come to reply to him, not only the statement that we appropriated $319,000,000 when the estimates merely called for $308,000,000, but I will make good also that the gentleman misled the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] by making him admit that the sinking fund was included in this year's appropriations, and not in other years, when he ought to have known that the sinking fund was included in them all, and I will demonstrate that fact.

Mr. GARFIELD. When the gentleman attempts that demonstration I shall be ready to try the question of arithmetic with him.

I come now to the last of the three paragraphs which I have quoted from the RECORD, and that is the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I would not refer to that statement now, particularly in the absence of the distinguished gentleman, but for the fact that the answer which I made at the moment, and which the gentleman very frankly acknowledged before the House was correct, does not seem to have reached the country at all. Accusations go on horseback and refutations travel very slowly on foot. The gentleman from Massachusetts startled the House, at least for a moment, and startled the country—by the statement which has been read at the Clerk's desk, that during the current fiscal year the appropriations had swollen from $290,000,000, the figures of last year, to $319,000,000, the figures of this year; in other words, that the extravagance of Congress had swollen the expenditures by the enormous sum of $29,000,000. That was indeed a startling statement, but the only thing startling about it was the $29,000,000; and when the correction was made by which the $29,000,000 were taken bodily out of his statement the cause of the alarm was gone, and the alarm itself ought also to have disappeared with it. But, sir, though the correction was made in open House, I desire to show to the committee how fully the country understands what the correction was. The daily papers the next morning contained about two columns of the Associated Press report of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I will read the only portion of that report which relates to the correction:

Mr. GARFIELD criticised some of Mr. DAWES'S figures, especially those relating to the sinking fund.

I will add that the special dispatches contained a much fuller report. But most of the public journals received only the dispatches of the Associated Press. I have no doubt that the reading public generally understand to this day that the first statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts remains uncontradicted, and that we have spent during the current fiscal year nearly $30,000,000 more than during the preceding year.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not just to compare the appropriations of one fiscal year with the expenditures of another, for the plain reason that expenditures do not equal appropriations. Appropriations are intended to be made large enough to cover and more than cover the expenditures. Although there may be deficiencies on some items, yet there are always still large sums of unexpended balances to be covered into the Treasury each year.

It is because of that very difference between appropriations and expenditures that the gentleman from Massachusetts could point to the fact that there were seventy-two millions of unexpended balances of former years ready to be covered into the Treasury at the end of the present fiscal year.

I have compiled from the annual and permanent appropriations a statement of the amounts appropriated for each fiscal year since 1869, not including the sinking fund. Stating it in round millions the account stands thus:

Year.	Total appropriations.	Deficiency appropriations for former years.
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1870	$317,000,000	$23,000,000
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1871	315,000,000	22,000,000
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1872	295,000,000	14,000,000
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1873	291,000,000	6,500,000
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1874	290,000,000	11,000,000

From this table it will be seen that in every year the appropriations exceed the expenditures; and that there has been a decrease in the amount of appropriations for each of those years.

In answer to all that has been said on the subject I point to the fact that the appropriations made at the last session of Congress, for the current year, were less than the appropriations for any year since the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] have leave to proceed without limit, making his own choice whether he will go on now or in the morning.

Mr. BECK. Who was entitled to the floor at the expiration of his hour?

The CHAIRMAN. No one, until the floor is assigned.

Mr. BECK. I rise to claim the floor, if it has been assigned to me.

Mr. KELLOGG. We will give you the floor, and what time you want.

The CHAIRMAN. By the custom of the Committee of the Whole, members of the committee from which the bill under consideration is reported are entitled in order to the floor. As the Chair finds from a minute before him, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] is assigned for the next hour, and has requested that that hour shall be assigned to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. I am aware of that fact; and it is for that reason that I have risen now. I do not want to claim the hour now. I want the time of the gentleman from Ohio extended just as long as he desires, if it be one or two hours. All I want is to have the fact recognized that I am entitled to the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] after the gentleman from Ohio shall have concluded his remarks, whenever that may be, whether at the end of one hour or at a later period.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, it will be so understood.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make no objection to the arrangement. I rise merely to a question of order that it is entirely beyond the power of the Committee of the Whole to make any such arrangement. It must be made by order of the House. Of course we all agree to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky at the expiration of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not, of course, object to any gentleman speaking; we expect the opposition to be heard. But I do object to an arrangement that will prevent other members of the Committee on Appropriations from speaking who may desire to be heard, or that will require them to postpone their remarks until everybody else is heard. I may not want, myself, to say anything on this subject, but I suppose there are other members of the Committee on Appropriations who may desire to address this committee. I am entirely willing that an arrangement shall be made that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed to conclude his remarks, and if the gentleman from Kentucky is to take the place of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, that he be heard at the same length. I have no objection to that at all.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to bring the attention of the committee back to my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] have permission to proceed without limit. The Chair hears no objection, and the permission is granted. The gentleman from Ohio will continue.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is to be a session to-night, and unless the gentleman desires to finish now——

Mr. GARFIELD. I am under obligations to the committee for the courtesy it has shown me, and with its permission I prefer to go on now.

Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, there have been two years since the war in which the expenditures were greater than during the preceding years. One was the year 1868, when the expenditures appeared greater by $30,000,000 than those of 1867. The other was in 1873, when the expenditures appeared $12,000,000 greater than in 1872. This latter year of increase was the first year of my service as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Whatever share of responsibility belongs to me for that increase I cheerfully bear. Not the least difficult part of my task was to follow in the footsteps of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] whose committee had largely reduced expenditures the preceding year; and this made it all the more difficult to continue the reduction.

It ought also to be borne in mind that reduction of our expenditures cannot be carried on indefinitely. The reductions we have made since 1866 were possible only because we have been coming down from the high level of war expenditures to the new basis of peace. It is apparent that we must soon reach the limit of reduction, must soon reach a point where the constant and rapid growth of the country, its increase of population and of settled territory, will bring us under the control of the normal law of increase; and that thenceforward our expenses must grow with the growth and the development of the country.

Expenditures thus adjusted are not only necessary and defensible, but they are the real index by which we measure the health and prosperity of a nation. Have we reached that limit of reduction?

In a speech which I delivered on the legislative appropriation bill of two years ago, I ventured to predict that if peace continued undisturbed we should reach the limit of possible reduction in 1876—that by that time the interest and premium on the public debt would be reduced to $95,000,000, and that the total annual expenditures, including this interest, would not exceed $230,000,000. Perhaps that was too hopeful a view. The heavy reduction of revenues makes it doubtful whether we can reduce the interest to the figure suggested, and then there seems to be a sort of immortality in war bills.

For the information of the House, I have made a careful analysis of the actual expenditures of the fiscal year which ended on the 30th of June, 1873. I have grouped these expenditures into three classes: First, those payments which were made directly on account of the war; secondly the expenses of the Army and Navy; thirdly, all other expenditures, including the civil establishment and public works:

I. Amounts paid during the fiscal year 1873 on account of expenses growing directly out of the late war:
Joint Select Committee on Alleged Outrages in Southern States		$1,087 20
Investigations in relation to elections in Louisiana and Arkansas		20,000 00

Grand total		290,345,245 33

*A small portion of this amount is for pensions to soldiers of the war of 1812.

It will be seen by an examination of this analysis that every expenditure enumerated in the first group is a direct charge of the late war. Now, that first group amounts in the total to $157,262,416.81; that is, 54 per cent. of all the expenditures of the Government, excluding the sinking fund for the last fiscal year. In examining those items one by one, I find but a single place where it seems to me there has been any extravagance whatever; and that is the expenses of the national loan, to which I will refer before I am done. I ask gentlemen to go over those items, and say what portion of the $157,000,000 expended in paying the charges of the war could possibly have been left out with justice.

In the second group I have taken the Army and the Navy—not counting in the public works for rivers and harbors, navy-yards, arsenals, and the like, that have been built in connection with the Navy and the Army, but the net charges of the Army and the Navy themselves. These make the second group; and they amount to $53,998,982.25; that is just 18 per cent. of the whole expense of the year.

The third group embraces all other expenditures, and I have subgrouped them for convenience into three heads: First, the civil service prosper, the civil establishment represented by this bill and other kindred appropriations; secondly, extraordinary expenses that came in during the year, but of a civil kind; thirdly, public works of all kinds grouped together. Now this third group and its sub-groups amount in the total to $79,803,837.27, or 28 per cent. of the entire expenses of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, take the results: $290,000,000—54 per cent. directly for the war; 18 per cent. for our military and naval establishments; and 28 per cent. for all other expenses put together. Going through the items carefully one by one, when gentlemen attack the economy of this Government they ought to specify the item that is extravagant; they must specify the item that is wrongfully there. It will not do to declaim against extravagance in general and not specify where it is. I have endeavored, in this statement to spread out, as on an open scroll, the expenditures of the Government; and I ask the help of every man in this House to point out the places in this list where real, effective, wise retrenchment, can be made.

Let our criticisms be accompanied by legislative provisions that will rectify the errors we complain of.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have drawn a few conclusions from my own study of these groups, as to what can be done. I believe I now speak for the Committee on Appropriations when I say that we have, in the first place, agreed upon this principle, that we will not undertake to cut the appropriations down at all hazards to the level of revenues, however low that level may be. We do not believe in that. We say and believe that if a cutting down such as ought to be made for its own sake does not carry the Treasury through, then it is the business of Congress to provide ways and means; it is the business of Congress to tax whenever it comes to the place where taxation is needed to prevent a deficit.

But the Committee on Appropriations propose two things: First, that wherever an expenditure has grown out of the war, or grown up in any other way, or an abuse that has crept in that expenditure and that abuse should be lopped off—any expense that can be mustered out, we propose to muster it out for all future time, if we can. Having done that, there is just one other thing we think can be done: going over the proper and fitting expenditures of the Government, if we come to any that can be postponed for a year without seriously impairing any great interest of the Government, we say, postpone it. When we have done those two things we do not propose to cut down another dollar anywhere. And if in this bill gentlemen can show us that we have anywhere cut into the life of the Government or its necessary functions, we desire to restore what has been taken away. If in any place we ought to have increased expenditures or appropriations, and have not provided them, point it out and we will move an increase.

Guided by these two principles, the Committee on Appropriations desire to suggest in what ways retrenchment can be made, and to that end I submit the estimates for the next year as we find them, and our belief of what can be done in the way of reduction. It should be understood that the estimates brought to us in the Book of Estimates are not all that we must pass upon. Others come which are not written in that book. On page 8 of the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury he makes an estimate of $319,000,000 for the next fiscal year. That is his estimate; it is very large. It includes the sinking fund, as it ought to; it includes most of the public works; but there are some things it does not include.

For example, it does not include the estimates for continuing the work on the State, War, and Navy Department building. That building, for some reason, has never been reported in any of the regular Books of Estimates. The reason is, I suppose, it has thus far been under the charge of the Secretary of State, and he sends in his estimates direct. They have not yet come in; but I understand that his estimate is $1,000,000 for the next fiscal year. Again, there has come in the deficiency estimates for nearly $3,000,000. In the next place, there has come in no estimate for the centennial celebration. That estimate seems to have sprung up in the two Houses themselves, or perhaps it has come to us from the country. Whatever that estimate is, it is to be added to make up the total. In the next place, the estimates of the board of public works do not come in the Book of Estimates, but come to us from the President direct. Whatever will be done in that direction will be done outside of the Book of Estimates. And finally, there has been appropriated, on an average, for the last two years, $3,500,000 in the form of relief acts, pension bills, bills sent to us from the southern claims commission, which appear in no Book of Estimates anywhere.

I believe I have now enumerated all the sources of estimates which are likely to come to us; and the grand total of all these is a little over $330,000,000.

That includes, of course, the sinking fund; that includes all estimates I can hear of from all sources. Of course a large number of these we will appropriate for; but taking that as the outside total of all possible, or at least probable, estimates, what reduction can we make?

The Committee on Appropriations have gone over all the bills with some care, at least far enough to find out what they think will be needed, except one. We have made no estimate as to how much reduction can be made in the postal service, and for the reason when the new lettings come in they may change the entire gauge and basis of the estimates. I therefore leave out of the calculation the post-office appropriation bill altogether. Leaving that out, I give the following as the facts thus far elicited:

We have introduced into the House and passed the Army, Navy, and fortification appropriation bills, and these three bills, as they passed the House, appropriate a total of $11,663,287 less than the original estimates. The gentleman from New York made the statement correctly as to the bills themselves, but one item was not given in his statement, the item of a million and a quarter, estimated for arming the fortifications, which did not go into either bill, and which the committee agreed to drop, and it was therefore never reported to the House in any form. So the three bills which have passed the House have appropriated $11,500,000, in round numbers, below the original estimates. In the bill now under discussion the reduction below the estimates is four and a half millions. In the Indian appropriation bill reported yesterday the reduction below the estimates is one million, I believe.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. One million seven hundred thousand dollars, in round numbers.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is better than I supposed. At the last accounts it was supposed it was about one million.

There now remains to be considered the great miscellaneous appropriation bill. We believe it will be possible to reduce on light-houses $1,000,000; on navy-yards, $400,000; on arsenals, $300,000; on public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, $900,000; and on appropriations for buildings under the charge of the supervising architect of the Treasury, $2,500,000; making a total reduction in the miscellaneous appropriation bill of $5,100,000.

The committee are of opinion that from the very large estimates for rivers and harbors there ought to be a reduction of eleven and a half millions. The estimates were over fifteen millions for this year, and we have rarely given five millions in any one year. The committee believe if four millions were given it would be more than the average for several years, and would enable us to make a reduction of eleven and a half millions on that bill.

The pensions will remain nearly stationary. Although the gentlemen in charge of the pension bill authorized me to say to the House that he thought we could reduce one half million, I do not reckon that in, thinking we will probably not be able to make a reduction there.

Mr. O'NEILL. Allow me to say in reference to that reduction that the bill does not reduce the pension of any soldier, or soldier's widow, or minor child.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course not. It is simply that the pensions themselves are expiring.

The Military Academy bill will remain almost precisely at the figures of last year. The gentleman in charge of that bill informs me that he does not see now that he can make a reduction of more than $10,000 below the figures of last year, for the reason that the number of cadets in the Military Academy is increased, in consequence of the increase of congressional districts, by forty-nine. Last year the Committee on Appropriations reported in favor of extending the term to six years. But that proposition was not adopted. We cannot therefore more than maintain the old level as regards the Military Academy.

The consular and diplomatic bill remains about the same. It represents the steady and even growth of our foreign relations.

Putting all these items of decrease together, I am enabled to figure up a reduction of $34,300,000 below the gross estimates which I have already presented. A large portion of this reduction was proposed by the heads of Departments in their revised estimates. Now, there must be subtracted from this $34,000,000 whatever we shall appropriate in this House and in the Senate, in the form of relief and claim bills. That, I think, will not be less than three millions; for it has not been less than that amount for many years. There must also be subtracted from whatever we give, if we give anything, to the centennial commission. There must also be subtracted from that whatever we give, if we give anything, to the board of public works. And finally, we must subtract from this $34,000,000 the amount we appropriate as deficiency.

It is therefore impossible to say what figure will represent the ultimate amount of reduction. But I believe I am reasonably safe in saying that we can reduce the expenditures, exclusive of the sinking fund, to $270,000,000 next year, provided the House sustain the Committee on Appropriations as they have done in the bills already reported.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been an estimate of a deficiency of two millions and some odd hundred thousand dollars. I would ask the gentleman whether he has included that in his calculations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have embraced that in my calculation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to two or three points in concluding my remarks upon this bill.

I cordially concur with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in all his efforts in the work of retrenchment. It is specially important that propositions for retrenchment be put into the form of legislation.

I believe there were seven leading points in which the gentleman recommended retrenchment and reform.

In the first place, he alluded to the necessity of doing away with our permanent appropriations as far as possible. In that he has the cordial support of the Committee on Appropriations; for on the 26th day of January, in obedience to the directions of the Committee on Appropriations, I introduced into the House two resolutions, of which one was an order to report in this bill now pending a proposition to repeal the law which makes permanent appropriations for the expenses of the national loan, and to make it a subject of annual appropriation. The other resolution empowered and directed the Committee on Ways and Means to undertake a like work in reference to the laws for collecting customs.

The Committee on Appropriations have given at least two full weeks of work to the subject of the expenses of national loans, and have provided in this bill for repealing all laws that make those expenses permanent appropriations. And, if the committee will indulge me for a moment, I will state what was the peculiar trouble in that case. During the war, when a great loan was issued, there was added a clause to the act authorizing it, that a certain sum or a certain per cent. of this particular loan should be used to pay for the expenses of negotiating it and printing the bonds. But in 1872 the Committee on Ways and Means brought in a bill, which passed without debate, making a permanent appropriation of 1 per cent. of all notes and bonds and fractional currency issued or reissued in any one year as the expense of the national loan. And during the past year there were nearly five hundred millions of such paper issued and printed at the Treasury Department, making thus an annual appropriation, without the revision of Congress, of nearly five millions a year.

Out of the appropriations for expenses of the national loan has grown up the Bureau of Engraving and Printing with its twelve hundred employés. There are to-day twelve hundred persons employed in that Bureau, and not only the number of employés, but their salaries, are regulated by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. And besides that, in four of the offices of the Treasury Department there are five hundred additional clerks and employés whose salaries are regulated only by the discretion of the Secretary, and whose numbers are regulated only by his discretion, who are not appropriated for in our annual bills, but are paid out of this permanent appropriation for the national loan. We have undertaken to sweep this law away and fix the number of clerks and employés, and make an annual appropriation based on the annual estimates. We have largely reduced the appropriation.

Last year the cost of collecting the customs was unusually large, and this cost is paid under a permanent appropriation. It ought not to be so, and we hope that before this bill is through the Committee on Ways and Means may devise a scheme by which a similar work can be done for the cost of collecting our revenues from customs to that we have done for the loans.

The most difficult thing we have encountered is the very great expense of our public works; and here, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I am not hostile to our public works, but rather am proud of them, as far as they are necessary to the public service. They belong to that class of our expenditures that should be called investments for the comfort, convenience, and growth of the nation. The greatest of these expenditures is on our rivers and harbors, and I call attention to the fact that in the last thirty-four years not a dollar has been appropriated for rivers and harbors in the United States during fifteen of those years. Our friends on the other side of the House when they were in power believed in the doctrine that we had no right to make internal improvements, and in fifteen of their years of power our docks were rotting and our harbors were filling up, because the theory of non-improvement left them to perish. More than 75 per cent. of all that has ever been appropriated, to open our rivers and clear out our harbors and make a highway for commerce on our coasts and within our inland lakes and rivers, has been appropriated since the war by the party now in power. I name these works only to praise them. They are carried on under the War Department, and no man, I believe, has charged corruption in the expenditure of the money; but it is one of that class of expenditures that can in part be postponed—that need not be done in a year. It is well that enough has been done to make it possible for us to open our internal avenues of commerce.

Another branch of our public service which no man can think of without being proud of it is our light-house system. I look upon it as one of the wonders of our early history, that during the first three months of the life of the first Congress that met, our fathers struck out on a new line, unknown in the history of legislation, when they declared in one simple act that the light that gleamed from every pharos on our shores should be free to the ships of all nations, without charge, and until recently the United States has stood absolutely alone in allowing the nations of the world to have the benefit of the lights without charge. I always feel a keen sense of satisfaction when I am permitted to aid in making appropriations to keep these lights burning on our shores. The life-saving stations which have been added are in the same direction. I would do nothing to cripple these great interests.

Another branch of public works I think we have overdone; at least we have been going faster in it than we needed to go; and that is our public buildings—our post-offices, court-houses, and official buildings of that sort; but there has been a demand all over the country for their increase, a demand which sometimes the committees of this House have not been able to resist. I remember how greatly the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in 1871 [Mr. DAWES] was pressed with these demands. I remember that on the 27th day of February, 1871, he brought in his sundry civil appropriation bill, and himself, by direction of his committee, moved to suspend the rules and make it in order, and it was made in order to put into the bill fifteen buildings never before authorized. I remember that they were kept in the bill and passed under a suspension of the rules. But amendments for still other buildings were added in the Committee of the Whole, until the bill sank under their weight, and was laid on the table, on the motion of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I allude to that to show what a pressure there has been on all Committees on Appropriations for increasing the expenditures on the public works. Although that bill was once defeated, it was afterward reconsidered and passed, with several of the new buildings stricken out. Yet they were left as a legacy to subsequent years.

Mr. Chairman, when we see that these works have been increasing on our hands, when we see, also, how difficult it is to limit their cost, we ought to be careful in undertaking them. I remember that on that very day, and in that very bill, the limitation was taken off the cost of the post-offices in New York and Boston. I know how the pressure from without is to increase the number and size of public buildings, but I hope the House will not appropriate any more money during the coming year for works not already begun. This is good economy, first, because our whole force in the architect's office are engaged to the top of their ability on works now in progress; and it is good economy, because we really cannot afford to do all the work on buildings which are fairly begun. Let the seventeen untouched buildings wait for a year, and then come in one by one, as the old ones are finished. We will go on with the work of building; we will make for this great nation a beautiful body, in which its great soul may dwell. But let us make it slowly, let us make it carefully, let us make it wisely, and when we have done all this, Mr. Chairman, I believe we shall find that not only during the present fiscal year, but still more during the next fiscal year, we will neither encounter a deficit, nor bring the Treasury to protest, nor the public credit to shame.

I believe that with the revival of business—which the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] shows has increased the estimated revenues $8,000,000 more than was estimated up to the beginning of this month—and with the restoration of public confidence, we shall be enabled to get through this year and the next without additional taxation. But if, at the end of our efforts to limit expenditures on the basis indicated, we find it necessary to impose a new tax, I have no doubt that Congress will stand up in its place and restore where it has cut too deeply into the revenues. I do not believe it will be necessary; I believe that we shall come through with no deficit, but with a reasonable surplus for the future.

Thanking the committee for the very kind attention with which they have honored me, I will relieve their patience.

Mr. BECK. I desire to speak for three minutes, and then I will yield for a motion to adjourn. All I desire to say in those three minutes is this: that not having any assurance when this bill will be taken up again, and being entirely, of course, at the mercy of gentlemen on the other side for an opportunity to be heard when they see fit to take up the bill, I wish to say now that when I get the floor I will demonstrate to this House, and I hope to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Ohio himself, that the appropriations and expenditures of this Government for the current fiscal year have been $15,000,000 in excess of the estimates of the Departments, or the Secretary of the Treasury has not told the truth. I will demonstrate that the sinking fund is embraced in the estimates of former years, as well as in the estimates for the current year; and that when the gentleman from Ohio got the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to take back his statement on that subject, the gentleman from Massachusetts abandoned what was a fact, and agreed to a statement which the facts do not warrant, and I will prove it. I will show, when I get the floor, that, in spite of all the talk about economy since the present managers of public affairs came into power, they have been shamefully extravagant; they have expended, independent of the sinking fund and the principal of the national debt, in the last seven years, $2,274,442,000, and have collected from the people $2,768,882,000; and that during the five years of General Grant's administration they have expended third-odd million dollars more than was expended for all the ordinary expenses of the Government from 1791 to 1861, inclusive, including the war of 1812-'15, the Mexican war, and all our Indian wars. I will show that the $72,000,000 of unexpended balances, of which we heard so much from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] are now kept out of the Treasury in palpable violation of law, and are kept out for the wrongful purpose of being drawn upon by the various Departments in order to keep down the appearance of deficiencies; and that during the first three months of this year, up to September, over $1,000,000 were drawn—$500,000 being drawn by the Postmaster-General—in violation of all law, and that they are being drawn upon every day. How much is gone now Congress can learn by passing a resolution I have offered. These sums are just as much the money of the people, and ought to be in the Treasury as certainly, as any other money there. Every draft on it is that much wrongfully abstracted by those who ought to be its faithful custodians.

I will show that every year before an election—I have no doubt you will keep down the expenses now—every year before an election, you keep down your expenditures under all sorts of pretenses, and then make them up by deficiencies the moment the election is over. And you are playing the same game again. I will show that, in spite of your professions of economy, the cost of collection of the customs has gone up from $6,000,000 to $8,500,000 during the last year, though your receipts have fallen off $28,000,000. I will show that in the Indian Bureau alone, as the Secretary of the Treasury proves, you are expending $8,500,000 this year, when last spring the Committee on Appropriations protested that the expenditures would be less than $5,500,000.

I will show that you are giving to spies and informers, in New York and elsewhere, almost fabulous sums; and that sums have been paid to the collector, naval officer, and appraiser in New York, amounting to nearly $500,000, during this Administration, (more than all the Senators in Congress draw for all their salaries, in a year and a half,) in order that they may control your political machinery.

I am prepared to show that your navy-yards are nests of corruption; while during the administration of Buchanan, of which you have complained so much, there were built twenty-seven first-class ships for less than two-thirds of what you are now expending; while until last year not one ship had been built since the war, notwithstanding all the expenditures.

I will show that your Secretary of the Treasury has been using over $3,000,000 a year out of the so-called loan fund to organize seven bureaus in his own office, with chiefs and heads, running them to suit himself, and paying them what he pleases; that he has twenty-eight hundred men in his Department when only fifteen hundred appear on your Books of Estimates, or, as Mr. DAWES shows, only four hundred of them are authorized by any law. And the Post-Office and other Departments are more extravagantly managed than his.

I will show from the speeches of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] which they made last year, that they promised they would cut down expenditures largely, which professions were made just before an election, as they are now, and I will further show that expenditures have gone up largely, in spite of their assertions. And I want to say this, that I will demonstrate that those gentlemen have known of all these wrongs and corruptions for many years, that I and other men on this floor, as well as men not now here, have pointed them out, but those gentlemen have never attempted to pass laws to reform these abuses, or to lop off the excrescences which are eating out the vitals of the people.

Sir, no ministry in England, no responsible party in any civilized country, would be allowed to retain place and power merely by giving periodic scoldings to thieves and robbers, who are only emboldened in their robbery of the Treasury by knowing that the scolding is not to be followed by punishment, and that if they will work for the party they can stay where they are and continue to do what they please.

I now yield for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman has done his interesting remarks at this time I wish to move that the committee rise. Before doing so I wish to say that every old member of Congress knows that for years past just preceding any election the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has promised to show, and show in a light clear as the noonday sun in the heavens above, all these things which he now promises to show us——

Mr. BECK. And if the House will go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow morning I will show it.

Mr. CONGER. But the gentleman never seems to have time, during the long years that intervene between one election and another, to make the exhibition either in the heavens above or in the House beneath. [Laughter.] I had hoped at this time, having looked with longing, eager expectation for the fulfillment of some of the grand promises which the gentleman has made, that now, before he departs forever from the scene of human action, the House will give him full time to develop all that he has promised to develop, and that he would extend into a grand speech all these promises which he has made now and heretofore, time and time again, to the House, which promises have fallen upon our ears, and which have sunk into our hearts, with a loss of all hope of their fulfillment.

Mr. RANDALL. Supposing that the gentleman is sincere in his remarks——

Mr. CONGER. I cannot consent to detain the committee to listen to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] for he knows he is not so interesting as I am when he talks. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I am more truthful, anyhow.

Mr. CONGER. If I yield to anybody it will be to my friend from Kentucky, that he may go on with his grand promises. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is not debatable.

The motion of Mr. CONGER was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. G. F. HOAR taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WOODFORD reported that pursuant to order of the House the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move that the House now take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2344) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation within the United States," approved March 3, 1873; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

OPERATORS OF DEPARTMENTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2224) appropriating $1,400 to pay the operators of the departmental telegraph connected with the two Houses of Congress be taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object. There is no hurry about that matter.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The bill has come from the Senate with a slight amendment. It ought to be passed now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will act on those amendments now. The gentleman who is entitled to pay as the telegraph operator connected with this House is called away by sickness, and unless this bill be passed he cannot draw his pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to hear the amendments read.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill these words:

Provided, That said lines shall be for the use only of Senators, Members of Congress, judges of the United States courts, and officers of Congress and of the Executive Departments, and solely on public business.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act making an appropriation for the operators of the Government telegraph connecting the Departments with the two Houses of Congress."

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to those amendments being concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

REPORT ON REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there shall be printed, for the use of the House, three thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs as to the reduction of the Army.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to have passed at this time a little bill.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I must object to passing bills now. I call for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. E. R. HOAR for a recess, it was agreed to.

Accordingly (at half-past five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3398 by inserting after the word "collector," in line 2, the words "or proper deputy collector;" and by inserting after the word "company," in line 4, the word "corporation;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3398. Every brewer shall, before commencing or continuing business, file with the collector or proper deputy collector of the district in which he designs to carry it on a notice in writing, stating the name of the person, company, corporation, or firm, the names of the members of any such company or firm, the places of residence of such persons, a description of the premises on which the brewery is situated, and of his or their title thereto, and the name of the owner thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3399 by substituting for the word "opened," in line 13, the word "open."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3400 by inserting after the word "collector," in line 17, the words "or the proper deputy collector;" by inserting in line 18, after the word "writing," the words "in duplicate;" by inserting in line 23, after the word "district," the words "or proper deputy collector;" by striking out in line 25 the words "internal-revenue officer," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "collector, deputy collector, inspector, or revenue agent;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3400. Every person who owns or occupies any brewery, or premises used or intended to be used for the purpose of brewing or making such fermented liquors, or who has such premises under his control or superintendence, as agent for the owner or occupant, or has in his possession or custody any brewing materials, utensils, or apparatus, used or intended to be used on said premises in the manufacture of beer, lager-beer, ale, porter, or other similar fermented liquors, either as owner, agent, or superintendent, shall, from day to day, enter, or cause to be entered, in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, the kind of such malt liquors, the estimated quantity produced in barrels, and the actual quantity sold or removed for consumption or sale in barrels or fractional parts of barrels. He shall also, from day to day, enter, or cause to be entered, in a separate book to be kept by him for that purpose, an account of all materials by him purchased for the purpose of producing such fermented liquors, including grain and malt. And he shall render to the collector, or the proper deputy collector, on or before the tenth day of each month, a true statement, in writing, in duplicate, taken from his books, of the estimated quantity in barrels of such malt liquors brewed, and the actual quantity sold or removed for consumption or sale during the preceding month; and shall verify, or cause to be verified, the said statement, and the facts therein set forth, by oath, to be taken before the collector of the district, or proper deputy collector, according to the form required by law. Said books shall be open at all times for the inspection of any collector, deputy collector, inspector, or revenue agent, who may take memorandums and transcripts therefrom.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3404 by inserting after the word "halves," in line 4, the word "thirds;" also by striking out in line 16 the words "to be" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and by him;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3404. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared, for the payment of such tax, suitable stamps denoting the amount of tax required to be paid on the hogsheads, barrels, and halves, thirds, quarters, sixths, and eighths of a barrel of such fermented liquors, (and shall also cause to be prepared suitable permits for the purpose hereinafter mentioned,) and shall furnish the same to the collectors of internal revenue, who shall each be required to keep on hand at all times a sufficient supply of permits, and a supply of stamps equal in amount to two months' sale thereof, if there be any brewery or brewery warehouse in his district; and such stamps shall be sold, and permits granted and delivered by such collectors, only to the brewers of their district respectively. Such collectors shall keep an account of the number of permits delivered and of the number and value of the stamps sold by them to each brewer; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall allow upon all sales of such stamps to any brewer, and by him used in his business, a deduction of 7½ per cent. And the amount paid into the Treasury by any collector on account of the sale of such stamps to brewers shall be included in estimating the commissions of such collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3407 by inserting before the word "fraudulent," in line 7, the words "false or;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 3407. Whenever any retail dealer, or other person, withdraws or aids in the withdrawal of any fermented liquor from any hogshead, barrel, keg, or other vessel containing the same, without destroying or defacing the stamp affixed thereon, or withdraws or aids in the withdrawal of any fermented liquor from any hogshead, barrel, keg, or other vessel, upon which the proper stamp has not been affixed or on which a false or fraudulent stamp is affixed, he shall be fined $100 and imprisoned not more than one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3408 by striking out in line 26 the words "by law," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "herein;" so that the last sentence of the section will read as follows:

And said permit must be affixed to every such vessel or cask so removed, and canceled or destroyed in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, and under the same penalties and liabilities as provided herein as to stamps.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3410 by inserting before the word "stamp," in line 7, the word "permit;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3410. When fermented liquor has become sour or damaged, so as to be incapable of use as such, brewers may sell the same for manufacturing purposes, and may remove the same to places where it may be used for such purposes, in casks, or other vessels, unlike those ordinarily used for fermented liquors, containing respectively not less than one barrel each, and having the nature of their contents marked upon them, without affixing thereon the permit stamp or stamps required.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3413 by striking out in line 7 the word "time," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "temporary period."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3418 by inserting in line 5, before the words "under oath," the word "subscribed;" so as to read, "a statement in duplicate subscribed under oath," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3425, line 14, to strike out the words "fine-cut shorts," and insert in lieu thereof "shorts refuse of fine-cut chewing;" so it will read:

All smoking-tobacco, and all cut and granulated tobacco other than fine-cut chewing, all shorts refuse of fine-cut chewing which has passed through a riddle of thirty-six meshes to the square inch, and all refuse scraps, clippings, cuttings, and sweepings of tobacco, in packages containing two, four, eight, and sixteen ounces each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3427, line 1, after the word "shall," to insert the words "in addition to all other requirements of this title relating to tobacco;" so it will read:

SEC. 3427. Every manufacturer of tobacco or snuff shall, in addition to all other requirements of this title relating to tobacco, print on each package, or securely affix, by pasting, on each package containing tobacco or snuff manufactured by or for him, a label, on which shall be printed the proprietor's or manufacturer's name, the number of the manufactory, the district and State in which it is situated, and these words.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to strike out section 3429, which is as follows:

SEC. 3429. Every person who sells or offers for sale any manufactured tobacco or snuff, representing the same to have been manufactured and the tax paid thereon prior to July 20, 1868, when the same was not so manufactured and the tax was not so paid, shall be liable to a penalty of $500 for each offense, and shall be fined not less than $500, nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3430, line 3, to strike out the word "marked," and insert in lieu thereof the word "stamped;" so it will read:

SEC. 3430. Every person who purchases, or receives for sale, any manufactured tobacco or snuff which has not been branded or stamped according to law, shall be liable to a penalty of fifty dollars for each offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3432, line 2, to strike out the word "assessed," and insert in lieu thereof the word "levied;" so it will read:

SEC. 3432. Upon tobacco and snuff manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be levied and collected the following taxes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the meaning of the word "levied?"

Mr. PENDLETON. It is the term used by assessors, and the Speaker understands it as well as anybody else. This amendment was proposed by gentlemen of the Internal Revenue Department. When the committee told them "assessed" would answer as well, the reply was the word "levied" was in the statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3433, line 4, to insert after the word "made" the words "shall be affixed and canceled in the mode prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and stamps when used on any wooden package shall be canceled by sinking a portion of the stamp into the wood with a steel die;" so it will read:

SEC. 3433. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared suitable and special stamps for the payment of the tax on tobacco and snuff, which shall indicate the weight and class of the article on which payment is to be made, shall be affixed and canceled in the mode prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and stamps when used on any wooden package shall be canceled by sinking a portion of the stamp into the wood with a steel die; and also such export stamps as are required by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in the same section, in line 11, to strike out the word "officers," and insert the word "officer;" and in line 12, to insert after "snuff" the words, "and to persons required by law to affix the same to tobacco or snuff, on and after the 1st day of January, 1869;" so that it will read:

Such stamps shall be furnished to the collectors requiring them, and each collector shall keep at all times a supply equal in amount to three months' sale thereof, and shall sell the same only to the manufacturers of tobacco and snuff in their respective districts who have given bonds as required by law and to owners or consignees of tobacco or snuff, upon the requisition of the proper custom-house officer having the custody of such tobacco or snuff, and to persons required by law to affix the same to tobacco or snuff on and after the 1st day of January, 1869.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3437, in lines 2 and 3, to strike out the words, "sold or offered for sale, or kept for sale;" so it will read:

SEC. 3437. The absence of the proper stamp on any package of manufactured tobacco or snuff shall be notice to all persons that the tax has not been paid thereon, and shall be prima facie evidence of the non-payment thereof. And such tobacco or snuff shall be forfeited to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3438, line 11, after the word "stamps," to insert the words, "for amount of tax thereon;" and also in line 13 to insert, after the word "manufactory," the words, "or while in transfer under bond or collector's permit from any manufactory, store, or warehouse, to the vessel for exportation to a foreign country;" so it will read:

SEC. 3438. Every person who removes from any manufactory, or from any place where tobacco or snuff is made, any manufactured tobacco or snuff without the same being put up in proper packages, or without the proper stamp for the amount of tax thereon being affixed and canceled, as required by law; or, if the same be intended for export, without the proper export stamp being affixed; or who uses, sells, or offers for sale, or has in possession, except in the manufactory, or while in transfer under bond or a collector's permit, from any manufactory, store, or warehouse, to a vessel for exportation to a foreign country, any manufactured tobacco or snuff, without proper stamps for amount of tax thereon being affixed and canceled; or who sells, or offers for sale, for consumption in the United States, or uses, or has in possession, except in the manufactory, or while in transfer under bond or collector's permit from any manufactory, store, or warehouse, to the vessel for exportation to a foreign country, any manufactured tobacco or snuff on which only the stamp marking the same for export has been affixed, shall for each such offense, respectively, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3442, in line 7, to insert after the word "inventory" the words, "under oath;" and also to add to the end of the section as follows: "and all manufactured tobacco of every description shall be taken and deemed as having been manufactured after July 20, 1868;" so it will read:

SEC. 3442. Every dealer in manufactured tobacco who had on hand more than twenty pounds of such tobacco, and every dealer in snuff who had on hand more than ten pounds of snuff, on the 20th day of July, 1868, whether manufactured in the United States or imported prior to that date, shall make, and shall deposit with the collector of the district, on the first day of every month, a true and complete inventory under oath of any such tobacco and snuff, respectively, then remaining on hand and not stamped. The collector shall make, and shall transmit to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, an abstract of the several inventories so filed in his office; and all manufactured tobacco of every description shall be taken and deemed as having been manufactured after July 20, 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3447, line 4, to strike out the word "receipt" and insert "stamp;" and in line 9 strike out the word "receipt" and insert "special-tax stamp;" so it will read:

SEC. 3447. Every peddler of tobacco shall obtain a certificate from the collector of his collection district, who is hereby authorized and directed to issue the same, giving the name of the peddler, his residence, the class of his special-tax stamp, and the fact of his having filed the required bond; and shall, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, produce and exhibit said certificate, and, unless he shall do so, may be deemed not to have paid the special tax, nor otherwise to have complied with the law. And whenever any peddler refuses to exhibit his special-tax stamp as aforesaid, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, said officer may seize the horse, or mule, wagon and contents, or pack, bundle, or basket of any person so refusing; and the collector of the district in which the seizure occurs may, on ten days' notice, published in any newspaper in the district, or served personally on the peddler, or at his dwelling-house, require such peddler to show cause, if any he has, why the horses or mules, wagon and contents, pack, bundle, or basket so seized shall not be forfeited. In case no sufficient cause is shown, proceedings for the forfeiture of the property seized shall be taken under the general provisions of the internal-revenue laws relating to forfeitures.

Mr. Speaker, special-tax stamp is a receipt.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3450 to strike out all after the words "United States," in line 20. The words proposed to be stricken out are as follows:

All tobacco and snuff stored in any export bonded warehouse on July 1, 1872, shall be subject to the tax provided by this chapter, and shall, before December 7

1872, be withdrawn from such warehouse upon the payment of the tax, or for export under the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in force on June 5, 1872, concerning withdrawals of tobacco and snuff from bonded warehouses. And any tobacco or snuff remaining in any export bonded warehouse after December 7, 1872, shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be sold or disposed of for the benefit of the same in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3454, at the end of line 13, to insert these words: "and shall verify the fact of such examination by oath, to be indorsed on the inventory;" and also in line 21 to insert after the word "true" the words "and accurate;" so it will read:

SEC. 3454. Every person now or hereafter engaged in the manufacture of cigars shall make and deliver to the collector of the district a true inventory, in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of the quantity of leaf-tobacco, cigars, stems, scraps, clippings, and waste, and of the number of cigar-boxes, and the capacity of each box, held or owned by him on the 1st day of January of each year, or at the time of commencing and at the time of concluding business, if before or after the 1st of January; setting forth what portion and kinds of said goods were manufactured or produced by him, and what were purchased from others, and shall verify said inventory by his oath indorsed thereon. The collector shall make personal examination of the stock sufficient to satisfy himself as to the correctness of the inventory, and shall verify the fact of such examination by oath to be indorsed on the inventory. Every such person shall also enter daily in a book, the form of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, an accurate account of all the articles aforesaid purchased by him, the quantity of leaf-tobacco, cigars, stems, or cigar-boxes, of whatever description, manufactured, sold, consumed, or removed for consumption or sale, or removed from the place of manufacture; and shall, on or before the 10th day of each and every month, furnish to the collector of the district a true and accurate abstract from such book, verified by his oath, of all such purchases, sales, and removals made during the month next preceding. In case of refusal or willful neglect to deliver the inventory or keep the account, or furnish the abstract aforesaid, he shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3455, line 3, after the word "true" to insert the words "and correct;" and in line 8 to strike out the word "assessor" and insert the word "collector;" so it will read:

SEC. 3455. It shall be the duty of every dealer in leaf-tobacco or material used in manufacturing cigars, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, to render to such officer a true and correct statement, under oath, of the quantity and amount of such leaf-tobacco or materials sold or delivered to any person named in such demand; and in case of refusal or neglect to render such statement, or if there is cause to believe such statement to be incorrect or fraudulent, the collector shall make an examination of persons, books, and papers in the manner provided in this title in relation to frauds and evasions.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to ask whether the word "collector" is copied from the new law. The word "assessor" was used in the old law, but the new law abolishes assessors.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is the reason for the amendment which I propose. I propose to make it as the law now is.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3457.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3457. Every manufacturer of cigars shall securely affix, by pasting on each box containing cigars manufactured by or for him, a label, on which shall be printed, together with the proprietor's or manufacturer's name, the number of the manufactory, and the district and State in which it is situated, these words, in clear and legible letters:

"NOTICE.—The manufacturer of the cigars herein contained has complied with all the requirements of law. Every person is cautioned under the penalties of law not to use this box for cigars again."

Every manufacturer of cigars who neglects to affix such label to any box containing cigars made by or for him, or sold or offered for sale by or for him, and every person who removes any such label, so affixed, from any such box, shall be fined fifty dollars for each box in respect to which such offense is committed.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out the words "in clear and legible letters."

I may say that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would be very glad to have these words remain in the revision, but as they could not be found in the law we do not retain them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3459.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3459. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared, for payment of the tax upon cigars, suitable stamps denoting the tax thereon. Such stamps shall be furnished to collectors requiring them, and collectors shall, if there be any cigar manufacturers within their respective districts, keep on hand at all times a supply equal in amount to two months' sales thereof, and shall sell the same only to the cigar manufacturers who have given bonds and paid the special tax, as required by law, in their districts, respectively, and to importers of cigars, who are required to affix the same to imported cigars in the custody of customs officers. Every collector shall keep an account of the number, amount, and denominate values of the stamps sold by him to each cigar manufacturer, and to other persons above described.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 10, after the words "customs officers," insert the words "and to persons required by law to affix the same to cigars on hand after the 1st day of April, 1869."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3461.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3461. Whenever any cigars are removed from any manufactory, or place where cigars are made, without being packed in boxes as required by the provisions of this chapter, or without the proper stamp thereon denoting the tax, or without burning into each box with a branding-iron the number of the cigars contained therein, the name of the manufacturer, and the number of the district and the State, or without properly affixing thereon and canceling the stamp denoting the tax on the same, or are sold or offered for sale not properly boxed and stamped, they shall be forfeited to the United States. And every person who commits any of the above-described offenses shall be fined for each such offense not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, and imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than two years. And every person who packs cigars in any box bearing a false or fraudulent or counterfeit stamp, or who affixes to any box containing cigars a stamp in the similitude of any stamp required to be used by the laws of the United States, whether the same be a customs or internal-revenue stamp; or who buys, receives, or has in his possession any cigars on which the tax to which they are liable has not been paid, or who removes or causes to be removed from any box any stamp denoting the tax on cigars, with intent to use the same, or who uses or permits any other person to use any stamp so removed, or who receives, buys, sells, gives away, or has in his possession any stamp so removed, or who makes any other fraudulent use of any stamp, or who removes from the place of manufacture any cigars not properly boxed and stamped as required by law, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendments:

In line 16, after the word "similitude," insert the words "or likeness;" also, in line 25, after the word "stamp," insert the words "intended for cigars."

We might not have thought it really necessary to put those words in; but being in the statute we propose to insert them.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3465.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3465. Every person who sells or offers for sale any cigars, representing the same to have been manufactured and the tax paid thereon prior to July 20, 1868, when the same were not so manufactured and the tax was not so paid, shall be liable to a penalty of $500 for each offense, and shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 6, after the words "shall be," insert the words "deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3467.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3467. Every person who sells or offers for sale any imported cigars, or cigars purporting or claimed to have been imported, not put up in packages and stamped as provided by this chapter, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

Prefix to the section, before the words "every person," these words:

All cigars, of every description, on hand after the 1st day of April, 1869, shall be taken to have been either manufactured or imported after the passage of the internal-revenue act of July 20, 1868, and shall be stamped accordingly.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3472.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3472. There shall be levied, collected, and paid, as hereafter provided:

First. A tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, or represented by certificates of deposit or otherwise, whether payable on demand or at some future day, with any person engaged in the business of banking;

Second. A tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of the capital of any bank, association, company, corporation, or person engaged in the business of banking beyond the amount invested in United States bonds: Provided, That the words "capital employed" shall not include money borrowed or received from day to day, in the usual course of business, from any person not a partner of or interested in the said bank, association, or firm;

Third. A tax of one-twelfth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, including as circulation all certified checks and all notes and other obligations calculated or intended to circulate or to be used as money, but not including that in the vault of the bank, or redeemed and on deposit for said bank; and an additional tax of one-sixth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of such circulation, issued as aforesaid, beyond the amount of 90 per cent. of the capital of any such bank, association, corporation, company, or person.

In the case of banks with branches, the tax herein provided shall be assessed upon the circulation of each branch severally, and the amount of capital of each branch shall be considered to be the amount allotted to it.

The deposits in associations or companies known as provident institutions, savings-banks, savings funds, or savings institutions, having no capital stock and doing no other business than receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of the parties making such deposits, without profit or compensation to the association or company, shall be exempt from tax on so much of their deposits as they have invested in securities of the United States, and on all deposits less than $2,000 made in the name of any one person.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendments:

After the word "person," in line 7, insert the words "bank, association, company, or corporation." In line 9 strike out the words "average amount of." In line 10 strike out the words "or person engaged," and insert instead the words "and on the capital employed by any person." In line 11 insert the word "average" before the word "amount." In line 37 strike out the words "less than," and insert the words "not exceeding."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3476.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3476. Every national banking association, State bank, or banker, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of notes of any person, or of any town, city, or municipal corporation, or of any State bank or State banking association, used for circulation and paid out by them.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out in lines 1 and 2 the words "or banker;" also strike out in lines 3 and 4, the words "or of any town, city, or municipal corporation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

Add after section 3476 the following as a new section:

SEC. . Every national banking association, State bank, or banker, or association, shall pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of notes of any town, city, or municipal corporation paid out by them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3477.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3477. A true and complete return of the amount of circulation, of deposits, and of capital, as aforesaid, and of the amount of notes of persons, town, city, or municipal corporation, State banks, or State banking associations paid out by them for the previous six months, shall be made and rendered in duplicate on the 1st day of December and the 1st day of June, by each of such banks, associations, corporations, companies, or persons, with a declaration annexed thereto, under the oath of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, corporation, or company, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amounts subject to tax, as aforesaid; and one copy shall be transmitted to the collector of the district in which any such bank, association, corporation, or company is situated, or in which such person has his place of business, and one copy to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "the," in line 1, insert the word "monthly;" after the word "the," in line 2, insert the word "monthly;" in line 4 strike out the words "by them," and insert therefor the words "as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3478.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3478. In default of the returns provided in the preceding section, the amount of circulation, deposit, capital, and notes of persons, town, city, and municipal corporations, State banks, and State banking institutions paid out, as aforesaid, shall be estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon the best information he can obtain. And for any refusal or neglect to make return and payment, any such bank, association, corporation, company, or person so in default shall pay a penalty of $200 besides the additional penalty and forfeitures provided in other cases.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 4 strike out the word "institutions," and insert therefor the word "associations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3480.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3480. The provisions of this chapter relating to the tax on the deposits, capital, and circulation of banks and to their monthly returns, except as contained in the preceding section, shall not apply to associations which are taxed under and by virtue of Title "National Banks."

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 3 strike out the word "monthly;" in the same line strike out the words "the preceding section," and insert in lieu thereof "sections 3474, 3475, 3476, 3479, and such parts of sections 3477 and 3478 as relate to the tax of 10 per cent. on certain notes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3482.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3482. There shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles mentioned in schedule A, and in the manner hereinafter provided, the taxes mentioned in said schedule.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the section the following:

And all the provisions of this chapter relating to dies, stamps, adhesive stamps and stamp duties, shall extend to and include, except where otherwise provided for or manifestly impracticable, all the articles or objects enumerated in schedule marked "A," subject to stamp duties, and shall apply to the provisions in relation thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3484.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3484. No bank-check, draft, or order, required by law to be stamped, which is issued without being duly stamped, shall be admitted or used in evidence in any court until a legal stamp, denoting the amount of tax, is affixed thereto, as prescribed by law.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to insert after the word "stamped," and before the word "shall," the words "nor any copy thereof;" also to add to the section the following:

And it shall not be lawful to record any instrument, document, or paper required by law at the time of its issue to be stamped unless a stamp or stamps of the proper amount shall have been affixed and canceled in the manner required by law; and the record of any such instrument, on which the proper stamp or stamps aforesaid shall not have been duly affixed and canceled, shall be utterly void, and shall not be used in evidence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would inquire, what are the instruments that require to be recorded with stamps under the existing law?

Mr. PENDLETON. It refers to deeds and wills that might have been made in 1864 or 1865, and kept until the present time; such instruments could not be recorded without the proper stamp or stamps, and I understand that such cases as this one are continually arising.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for section 3485.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 3485. Any person or persons who shall make, sign, or issue, or who shall cause to be made, signed, or issued, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatever, or shall accept, negotiate, or pay, or cause to be accepted, negotiated, or paid, any draft or order for the payment of money, without the same being duly stamped, or having thereupon an adhesive stamp for denoting the tax chargeable thereon, and canceled in the manner required by law, with intent to evade the provisions of this title, shall, for every such offense, forfeit the sum of fifty dollars, and such instrument, document, or paper, draft, or order, not being stamped according to law, shall be deemed invalid and of no effect: Provided, That hereafter, in all cases where the party has not affixed to any instrument the stamp required by law thereon at the time of making or issuing the said instrument, and he or they, or any party having an interest therein, shall be subsequently desirous of affixing such stamp to said instrument, or if said instrument be lost, to a copy thereof, he or they shall appear before the collector of the revenue of the proper district, who shall, upon the payment of the price of the proper stamp required by law, and of a penalty of double the amount of tax remaining unpaid, but in no case less than five dollars, and when the whole amount of the tax denoted by the stamp required shall exceed the sum of fifty dollars, on payment also of interest at the rate of 6 per cent. on said tax from the day on which such stamp ought to have been affixed, affix the proper stamp to such instrument or copy, and note upon the margin thereof the date of his so doing, and the fact that such penalty has been paid; and the same shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if stamped when made or issued. And when the original instrument, or a certified or duly proved copy thereof, as aforesaid, duly stamped so as to entitle the same to be recorded, shall be presented to the clerk, register, recorder, or other officer having charge of the original record, it shall be lawful for such officer, upon the payment of the fee legally chargeable for the recording thereof, to make a new record thereof, or to note upon the original record the fact that the error or omission in the stamping of said original instrument has been corrected pursuant to law; and the original instrument, or such certified copy, or the record thereof, may be used in all courts and places in the same manner and with like effect as if the instrument had been originally stamped. But no right acquired in good faith before the stamping of such instrument or copy thereof, and the recording thereof, as herein provided, if such record be required by law, shall in any manner be affected by such stamping as aforesaid.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would say that that is simply a copy of the act. It was cut right out of the compilation of the internal-revenue laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3486.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3486. In all cases where an adhesive stamp is used for denoting any tax imposed under this chapter, except as hereinafter provided, the person using or affixing the same shall write thereon the initials of his name and the date on which such stamp is attached or used, so that it may not again be used. And every person who fraudulently makes use of an adhesive stamp to denote any tax imposed by this chapter without so effectually canceling and obliterating such stamp, except as before mentioned, shall forfeit the sum of fifty dollars: Provided, That any proprietor of proprietary articles, or articles subject to stamp tax under schedule A, shall have the privilege of furnishing, without expense to the United States, in suitable form, to be approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his own dies or designs for stamps to be used thereon, which shall be made under the direction and retained in the possession of the said Commissioner, for the separate use of such proprietor, and shall not be duplicated to any other person; and that in all cases where such stamp is used, instead of said proprietor writing the date thereon, the said stamp shall be so affixed on the box, bottle, or package, that in opening the same, or using the contents thereof, the said stamp will be effectually destroyed; and, in default thereof, such proprietor shall be liable to a penalty of fifty dollars. And every person who fraudulently obtains or uses any of the aforesaid stamps, or designs therefor, or who forges or counterfeits, or causes or procures to be forged or counterfeited, any representation or similitude, or colorable imitation of the said last-mentioned stamp, or any engraver or printer who sells or gives away said stamps, or selling the same, or, being a merchant, broker, peddler, or person dealing, in whole or in part, in similar goods, wares, merchandise, manufactures, preparations, or articles, or those designed for similar objects or purposes, has knowingly or fraudulently in his possession any such forged, counterfeited likeness, similitude, or colorable imitation of the said last-mentioned stamp, shall forfeit the said stamps and the articles upon which they are placed, and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to insert after the word "stamp," in line 33, the words "shall be deemed guilty of a felony and."

Mr. POLAND. Ought not that amendment to come in after the word "placed," in the thirty-fourth line, so that it will read:

Shall forfeit the said stamps, and the article upon which they are placed, and shall be deemed guilty of a felony and be punished, &c.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no objection to modifying my amendment in that way; but in that case the word "and" at the end of my amendment should be omitted, as the word is already in the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3487.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3487. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to prescribe such method for the cancellation of stamps as he may deem expedient and effectual. And he is authorized, in his discretion, to make the application of such method imperative upon the manufacturers of proprietary articles, or articles included in schedule A.

Mr. PENDLETON. In line 2, after the word "stamps," I move to insert "as a substitute for, or in addition to, the methods prescribed in this chapter."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3489.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3489. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, from time to time, make regulations, upon proper evidence of the facts, for the allowance of such of the stamps issued under the provisions of this chapter as may have been spoiled, destroyed, or rendered useless or unfit for the purpose intended, or for which the owner may have no use, or which through mistake may have been improperly or unnecessarily used, or where the rates or duties represented thereby have been paid in error, or remitted; and such allowance shall be made either by giving other stamps in lieu of the stamps so allowed for, or by repaying the amount or value, after deducting therefrom, in case of repayment, the sum of 5 per cent. to the owner thereof; but no allowance shall be made in any case until the stamps so spoiled or rendered useless shall have been returned to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or until satisfactory proof has been made showing the reason why said stamps cannot be so returned,

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to insert in line 4, after the words "this chapter," the words "or any internal-revenue act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have also some amendments to move to section 3490.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3490. In any collection district where, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the facilities for the procurement and distribution of stamped paper and adhesive stamps, as provided in this chapter, are insufficient, the Commissioner is authorized to supply to collectors, assessors, assistant treasurers of the United States, designated depositaries, and postmasters, without prepayment therefor, suitable quantities of stamped checks, drafts, or orders, as aforesaid, and of adhesive stamps, as required by this chapter; and he may in advance require of any such person a bond, with sufficient sureties, in an amount equal to the value of any such stamped paper or stamps which may be placed in his hands and remain unaccounted for, conditioned for the faithful return of all amounts undisposed of, and for the payment, monthly, of all amounts sold or not remaining on hand. And he shall allow to such persons the highest rates of commissions allowed to any other parties purchasing such stamped paper or stamps. It shall be the duty of such collector to supply his deputies with, and to sell to other parties within his district who may apply therefor, such stamped paper and adhesive stamps, upon the same terms allowed by law, or under the regulations of the said Commissioner.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend by striking out the word "assessors" where it occurs near the beginning of the section; and also the words "checks, drafts, or orders," after the word "stamped," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "paper;" and near the close of the first sentence, before the word "amounts," insert the words "quantities or;" and in the third sentence after the words "supply his deputies with," strike out "and" and insert "or."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have a substitute to move to section 3492.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3492. Every person who forges or counterfeits, or causes or procures to be forged or counterfeited, any representation or similitude of the stamp provided by law to be used on bank-checks, drafts, or orders for the payment of money, as aforesaid; or who stamps or marks, or causes or procures to be stamped or marked, with any such forged or counterfeited representation or similitude, any paper or bank-check, draft or order, as aforesaid; or who utters, or sells, or exposes to sale, any paper or bank-check, draft, or order, as aforesaid, having thereon any such forged or counterfeited representation or similitude; or who fraudulently removes, or causes to be removed, the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been provided by law to be used on bank-checks, drafts, or orders, as aforesaid, from any bank-check, draft, or order, as aforesaid; or who fraudulently uses or places, or causes to be used or placed, upon any bank-check, draft, or order, as aforesaid, any stamp, or the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been provided, as last aforesaid, and which shall have been removed from any other bank-check, draft, or order, as aforesaid; or who willfully removes, or causes to be removed, alters, or causes to be altered, the canceling or defacing marks on any stamp, as aforesaid, with intent to use the same, or to cause the use of the same, after it shall have been once used; or who knowingly sells or buys any such washed or restored stamps, or offers the same for sale, or gives or exposes the same to any person for use, or knowingly uses the same, or prepares the same with intent for the further use thereof; or who knowingly, and without lawful excuse, (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused,) has in his possession any washed or restored stamps, which have been removed from any bank-check, draft, or order, as aforesaid, shall forfeit the said counterfeit or restored stamps, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court. And the fact that any adhesive stamp so bought, sold, offered for sale, used, or had in possession, as aforesaid, has been washed or restored by removing or altering the canceling or defacing marks thereon, shall be prima facie proof that such stamp has been once used, and removed by the possessor thereof from some bank-check, draft, or order, as aforesaid, in violation of this section.

The substitute was as follows:

If any person shall forge or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be forged or counterfeited, any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument which shall have been provided, or may hereafter be provided, made, or used in pursuance of the provisions of this chapter, or of any previous provisions of law on the same subjects, or shall forge, counterfeit, or resemble, or cause to be forged, counterfeited, or resembled the impression, or any part of the impression, of any such stamp, die, plate, or other instrument as aforesaid, upon any paper, or shall stamp or mark, or cause or procure to be stamped or marked, any paper with any such forged or counterfeited stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, as aforesaid, with intent to defraud the United States of any of the taxes hereby imposed, or any part thereof; or if any person shall utter, or sell, or expose to sale, any paper, article, or thing, having thereupon the impression of any such counterfeited stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any such forged, counterfeited, or resembled impression, or part of impression, as aforesaid, knowing the same to be forged, counterfeited, or resembled; or if any person shall knowingly use, or permit the use, of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been so provided, made, or used, as aforesaid, with intent to defraud the United States; or if any person shall fraudulently cut, tear, remove, or cause or procure to be cut, torn, or removed, the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been provided, made, or used in pursuance of this chapter, or of any previous provisions of law on the same subjects, from any paper, or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes imposed by law; or if any person shall fraudulently use, join, fix, or place, or cause to be used, joined, fixed, or placed to, with, or upon any paper, or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes hereby imposed, any adhesive stamp, or the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been provided, made, or used in pursuance of law, and which shall have been cut, torn, or removed from any other paper, or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes imposed by law; or if any person shall willfully remove, or cause to be removed, alter or cause to be altered, the canceling or defacing marks on any adhesive stamp, with intent to use the same, or to cause the use of the same after it shall have been once used, or shall knowingly or willfully sell or buy such washed or restored stamps, or offer the same for sale, or give or expose the same to any person for use, or knowingly use the same or prepare the same with intent for the further use thereof; or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any washed, restored, or altered stamps, which have been removed from any paper, instrument, or writing, then, or in every such case, every person so offending, and every person knowingly and willfully aiding, abetting, or assisting in committing any such offense as aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit the said counterfeit stamps and the articles upon which they are placed, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court; and the fact that any adhesive stamps so bought, sold, offered for sale, used, or had in possession, as aforesaid, has been washed or restored by removing or altering the canceling or defacing marks thereon, shall be prima facie proof that such stamp has been once used and removed by the possessor thereof from some paper, instrument, or writing charged with taxes imposed by law, in violation of the provisions of this section.

The substitute was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have an amendment to section 3293.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3293. Whenever any person makes, prepares, and sells, or removes for consumption or sale, drugs, medicines, preparations, compositions, articles, or things, including perfumery, cosmetics, lucifer or friction matches, cigar-lights, wax-tapers, playing-cards, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, upon which a tax is imposed by law, as enumerated in schedule A, without affixing thereto an adhesive stamp or label denoting the tax before mentioned, he shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars for every omission to affix such stamp: Provided, That lucifer or friction matches and cigar-lights and wax-tapers may be removed from the place of manufacture for export to a foreign country without payment of tax or affixing stamps thereto, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend by inserting the word "and" between "wax-tapers" and "playing-cards;" and before the words, "in schedule A," insert the words "and mentioned."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendments are to section 3495.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3495. Every maker or manufacturer of any of the articles or commodities mentioned in schedule A, who sells, exposes for sale, sends out, removes, or delivers any article or commodity, manufactured as aforesaid, before the duty thereon has been fully paid, by affixing thereon the proper stamp, as provided by law, or who hides or conceals, or causes to be hidden or concealed, or who removes or conveys away, or deposits, or causes to be removed or conveyed away from or deposited in any place, any such article or commodity, to evade the duty chargeable thereon, or any part thereof, shall be subject to a penalty of $100, together with the forfeiture of any such article or commodity.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendments are to insert in the first part of the section, after the words, "in schedule A, who," the words, "to evade the duty chargeable thereon, or any part thereof;" before the words "hides or conceals," near the middle of the section, insert, "to evade as aforesaid;" strike out the word "who," before "removes or conveys;" and near the close of the section strike out the words "to evade the duty chargeable thereon, or any part thereof."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend the latter part of section 3496, in line 32, by inserting the words "and excise," between the words "stamp" and "duty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3500.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3500. Whenever any article upon which a tax is required to be paid by means of a stamp is sold or removed, by the manufacturer thereof, for sale without the use of the proper stamp, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, within a period of not more than two years after such removal or sale, upon such information as he can obtain, to estimate the amount of the tax which has been omitted to be paid, and to make an assessment therefor upon the manufacturer or producer of such article. He shall certify such assessment to the collector, who shall immediately demand payment of such tax, and, upon the neglect or refusal of payment by such manufacturer or producer, shall proceed to collect the same in the manner provided for the collection of other assessed taxes.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendment is to insert "for sale" after the word "remove," near the beginning of the section; to strike out the words "for sale" before the words "without the proper stamp," and after the words "proper stamp" insert "in addition to the penalties imposed by law for such sale and removal."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendments are in section 3501.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3501. There shall be an allowance of drawback on all articles mentioned in schedule A, on which any internal tax shall have been paid, except lucifer or friction matches, cigar-lights, and wax-tapers, equal in amount to the tax paid thereon and no more, when exported; to be paid by the warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury or of the Treasurer of the United States, out of any money arising from internal duties not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no allowance of drawback shall be made for any amount, claimed or due, less than ten dollars, nor for any such articles exported prior to June 30, 1864. The evidence that any such tax has been paid as aforesaid shall be furnished to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue by the person claiming the allowance of drawback, and the amount shall be ascertained under such regulations as shall be prescribed from time to time by the Commissioner, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. And the said Secretary may make such regulations with regard to the form of certificates of drawback and the issuing thereof as he may deem necessary.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendment is in the first line, after the words "allowance of drawback on," insert the words "fermented liquors and on;" strike out the words "or of" before the words "Treasurer of the United States," and strike out the words "June 30, 1854," and insert "March 31, 1868."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. The next amendment is to section 3502.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 3502. Certificates of drawback, issued in pursuance of the preceding section, may, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be received by the collector or his deputy in payment of taxes required on articles therein mentioned.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendment is to strike out the words, at the end of the section, "required on articles therein mentioned," and insert in lieu thereof "imposed by this title."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that sections 3501, 3502, and that portion of 3503 preceding schedule A be placed at the beginning of chapter 11, on page 898.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend the first paragraph of schedule A, under the head of "medicines or preparations," by striking out the word "afflicting" and inserting the word "affecting," near the beginning of the paragraph. The word "affecting" is in the old law, and I suppose if anything afflicted the "human or animal body" it would also affect it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3504 by striking out, in line 4, the word "now," and inserting, after the word "force," the words "prior to the 1st day of October, 1870;" so that the phrase will read, "acts in force prior to the 1st day of October, 1870."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to make the same amendment in sections 3505 and 3506.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3509 by striking out, in line 10, after the word "stamp," the words "provided for in this title," and inserting therefor the words "above mentioned."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3510 by inserting after the word "mode," in line 1, the words "or time;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3510. Whenever the mode or time of assessing or collecting any tax which is imposed is not provided for, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may establish the same by regulation. He may also make all such regulations, not otherwise provided for, as may have become necessary by reason of any alteration of law in relation to internal revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3513 by inserting after the word "fine," in line 18, the words "or penalty," and by adding at the end of the section the following:

And all boilers, stills, or other vessels, tools, and implements used in distilling or rectifying, and forfeited under any of the provisions of this title; and all condemned material, together with any engine or other machinery connected therewith, and all empty barrels, and all grain or other material suitable for distillation, shall, under the direction of the court in which the forfeiture is recovered, be sold at public auction, and the proceeds thereof, after deducting the expenses of sale, shall be disposed of according to law. And all spirits or spirituous liquors which may be forfeited under the provisions of this title, unless therein otherwise provided, shall be disposed of by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to move a substitute for section 3519.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3519. Whenever any distiller, rectifier, or wholesale liquor dealer knowingly and willfully omits, neglects, or refuses to do, or to cause to be done, any of the things required by law in the carrying on of his business, or does anything prohibited by any provision of this title, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest as owner, shall be forfeited to the United States. And whenever any manufacturer of tobacco or cigars knowingly and willfully omits, neglects, or refuses to do, or to cause to be done, any of the things required by law in the carrying on of his business, or does anything prohibited by any provision of this title, all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory shall be forfeited to the United States. And in cases where no specific penalty or punishment is imposed upon such distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, by any other section of this title, for the omitting, neglecting, or refusing to do, or to cause to be done, the thing required, or for doing the thing prohibited, as aforesaid, the person offending as aforesaid shall pay a penalty of $1,000.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to strike out the section just read, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3519. If any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars shall knowingly or willfully omit, neglect, or refuse to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this title prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this title for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000; and if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, [or] wholesale liquor dealer, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest as owner, and if he be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory, shall be forfeited to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I wish to move an amendment to section 3520.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3520. In every case where any goods or commodities are forfeited under any internal-revenue law, all casks, vessels, cases, or other packages whatsoever, containing or which shall have contained such goods or commodities, respectively, shall be forfeited.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to add to the section the following:

And where any whisky, tobacco, or other articles of manufacture or produce, requiring brands, stamps, or marks of whatever kind to be placed thereon, shall be sold upon distraint, forfeiture, or other process provided by law, the same not having been branded, stamped, or marked as required by law, the officer selling the same shall, upon sale thereof, fix, or cause to be affixed, the brands, stamps, or marks so required, and deduct the expense thereof from the proceeds of such sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3521 by striking out in line 2 "the preceding," and inserting after the word "section" the figures "3516."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend section 3522 by inserting after the word "provisions," in line 2, the words "of section 3516;" also, by inserting after the word "issue," in line 27, the words "to a deputy collector or;" also, by inserting before the word "marshal," in the same line, the words "deputy collector or;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3522. When any property which is seized under the foregoing provisions of section 3516 is liable to perish or become greatly reduced in price or value by keeping, or when it cannot be kept without great expense, the owner thereof, or the marshal of the district, may apply to the collector of the district to examine it; and if, in the opinion of said collector, it shall be necessary that the said property should be sold to prevent such waste or expense, he shall appraise the same; and thereupon the owner shall have said property returned to him upon giving bond in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the collector shall deem good and sufficient, to abide the final order, decree, or judgment of the court having cognizance of the case, and to pay the amount of said appraised value to the collector, marshal, or otherwise, as he may be ordered and directed by the court; which bond shall be filed by said collector with the United States district attorney for the district in which said proceedings in rem may be commenced: Provided, That in case said bond shall have been executed and the property returned before seizure thereof by virtue of the process aforesaid, the marshal shall give notice of pendency of proceedings in court to the parties executing said bond, by personal service or publication, and in such manner and form as the court may direct, and the court shall thereupon have jurisdiction of said matter and parties in the same manner as if such property had been seized by virtue of the process aforesaid. But if said owner shall neglect or refuse to give bond, the said collector shall issue to a deputy collector, or to the marshal aforesaid, an order to sell the same; and the deputy collector or marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the said property at public auction in the same manner as goods may be sold on final execution in said district; and the proceeds of the sale, after deducting the reasonable costs of the seizure and sale, shall be paid to the court aforesaid, to abide its final order, decree, or judgment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend by inserting after section 3526 the following new sections:

SEC. —. The privilege of purchasing supplies of goods imported from foreign countries for the use of the United States duty free, which now does or hereafter shall exist by provision of law, shall be extended, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to all articles of domestic production which are subject to tax by the provisions of this title.

SEC. —. An act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," passed March 2, 1833, shall not be so construed as to apply to cases arising under an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," passed June 30, 1864, or any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof, nor to any case in which the validity or interpretation of said act or acts shall be in issue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like to go back to section 3244, page 802. I move in line 5 to strike out the comma after the word "statement;" so it will read:

SEC. 3244. Whenever it is ascertained that any list which has been or shall be delivered to any collector is imperfect or incomplete, in consequence of the omission of the name of any person liable to tax, or in consequence of any omission, or understatement, or undervaluation, or false or fraudulent statement contained in any return made by any person liable to tax, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, at any time within fifteen months from the time of the delivery of the list to the collector as aforesaid, enter on any monthly or special list the name of such person so omitted, together with the amount of tax for which he may have been or shall become liable, and also the name of any such person in respect to whose return, as aforesaid, there has been or shall be any omission, undervaluation, understatement, or false or fraudulent statement, together with the amount for which such person may be liable, above the amount for which he may have been or shall be assessed upon any return made as aforesaid; and he shall certify and return such list to the collector as required by law. And all provisions of law for the ascertainment of liability to any tax, or the assessment or collection thereof, shall be held to apply, so far as may be necessary, to the proceedings herein authorized and directed.

It makes quite a difference in the meaning of it. It has been found that commas are pretty important things in connection with these laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move, on page 811, section 3280, line 5, to insert before the word "value" the word "par;" so that it will read:

SEC. 3280. Every collector shall be charged with the whole amount of taxes, whether contained in lists transmitted to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or by other collectors, or delivered to him by his predecessor in office, and with the additions thereto, with the par value of all stamps deposited with him, and with all moneys collected for penalties, forfeitures, fees, or costs; and he shall be credited with all payments into the Treasury made as provided by law, with all stamps returned by him uncanceled to the Treasury, and with the amount of taxes contained in the lists transmitted in the manner heretofore provided to other collectors, and by them receipted as aforesaid; also with the amount of the taxes of such persons as may have absconded or become insolvent, prior to the day when the tax ought, according to the provisions of law, to have been collected, and with all uncollected taxes transferred by him or by his deputy acting as collector, to his successor in office.

The value of stamps may be little in themselves, but when an officer delivers to another officer stamps, he delivers them at their par value.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3292, line 2, to strike out the words "any internal-revenue law," and insert the words "section 3220;" so it will read:

SEC. 3292. No discontinuance or nolle prosequi of any prosecution under section 3220 shall be allowed without the permission in writing of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move on page 818, section 3307, line 47, to insert the word "tax" before the word "stamp," and in line 52 to strike out the words "or wines;" so it will read:

Wholesale liquor dealers shall pay $100. Every person who sells or offers for sale foreign or domestic distilled spirits or wines, in quantities of not less than five wine gallons at the same time, shall be regarded as a wholesale liquor dealer. But no distiller who has given the required bond, and who sells only distilled spirits of his own production at the place of manufacture, in the original packages to which the stamps are affixed, shall be required to pay the special stamp tax of a wholesale liquor dealer on account of such sales.

Fifth. Retail dealers in malt liquors shall pay twenty dollars. Every person who sells or offers for sale malt liquors in quantities of five gallons or less at one time, but who does not deal in spirituous liquors, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in malt liquors.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3210, on page 791, after the word "collector," in line 8, to insert "and the same rule shall apply to salaries and commissions of assessors and collectors heretofore earned and accrued;" so it will read:

SEC. 3210. When any part of the compensation of the collector of any district is by commission upon assessments or collections, and, in consequence of a new appointment, is due to more than one collector within the same year, such commissions shall be apportioned between such collectors; but in no case shall a greater amount of compensation be allowed to two or more collectors in the same district than shall have been authorized by law to be allowed to one collector, and the same rule shall apply to salaries and commissions of assessors and collectors heretofore earned and accrued.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3211, after the word "writing," in line 2, to insert the words "under his hand;" so it will read:

SEC. 3211. Each collector shall be authorized to appoint, by an instrument in writing under his hand, as many deputies as he may think proper, to be by him compensated for their services; to revoke any such appointment, giving such notice thereof as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe; and to require and accept bonds or other securities from such deputies. Each such deputy shall have the like authority, in every respect, to collect the taxes, levied or assessed within the portion of the district assigned to him, which is by law invested in the collector himself; but each collector shall, in every respect, be responsible both to the United States and to individuals, as the case may be, for all moneys collected, and for every act done or neglected to be done by any of his deputies while acting as such.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move in section 3219 to insert in line 10, between the word "the" and the word "direction," the words "supervision and;" so it will read:

SEC. 3219. The Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint in every collection district where they may be necessary one or more internal-revenue gaugers, who shall each take an oath faithfully to perform his duties, and shall give bond, with one or more sureties, satisfactory to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the faithful discharge of the duties assigned to him by law or regulations; and the penal sum of said bond shall not be less than $5,000, and said bond shall be renewed or strengthened as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require. The duties of every such gauger shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the collector of the district to which he may be assigned, or of the collector in charge of exports at any port of entry to which he may be assigned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now ask to turn back to page 672, under the title of "Qualification, pay, and duties of officers." We have been over this chapter once before. I have spent, with a gentleman who is exceedingly expert, several busy days on this subject. They have been subjects of legislation ever since the formation of the Government, changing from year to year.

Generally found in tariff bills and in appropriation bills are every sort of special provision in reference to the pay and emoluments of different classes of officers in different places, without any settled rule whatever. It is a work of almost impossible accomplishment to find out how much each one is legally entitled to. I say this in apology for the commission who revised the statutes.

I move in section 2657, lines 8 and 9, to strike out "to the collector for the district of Wilmington, North Carolina, 2½ per cent.;" in line 16 to strike out "Georgetown, in the District of Columbia;" and in line 21, after "Portsmouth," to insert "New Hampshire."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 672, section 2658, line 9, strike out "Plymouth, North Carolina;" in line 12, strike out "Biddeford;" in line 13, strike out "one" and insert "two;" and in the same line, after "one hundred," insert "and fifty."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 673, after section 2672, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. The collector of the district of Wilmington, Delaware, shall receive, in addition to the fees and emoluments established by law, the sum of $500 a year.

That was omitted in the revision.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on the same page, to strike out section 2662, which is as follows:

SEC. 2662. The collector for the district of Pensacola shall, in addition to the fees and emoluments allowed by law, receive 3 per cent. commissions, and no more, on all moneys received and paid by him on account of duties on imports or tonnage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 674, section 2673, to add to the end of the section the following:

Collectors and surveyors of the northern districts of the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, are authorized to keep on sale at their several offices blank manifests and clearances required for the business of their districts, and to charge the sum of ten cents and no more for each blank which shall be prepared and executed by them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2675.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2675. The collectors for the districts of Beaufort, in South Carolina, and Pensacola shall receive a salary of $1,000 a year each.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of the section the words, "in addition to the fees of office."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2676.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2676. The collectors for the district of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for the districts of Cherrystone, Brunswick, Saint Augustine, Saint Mark's, and Apalachicola shall receive a salary of $500 a year each.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the section the following words: "in addition to the fees of office."

Some of these salaries are without fees, some are with fees, and some with a percentage besides.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2688.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2688. Whenever the emoluments of any collector of either of the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, or New Orleans shall exceed $4,000, or the emoluments of any naval officer of either of those ports shall exceed $5,000, or the emoluments of any surveyor of either of said ports shall exceed $4,500 in any one year, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to his office in the same year, the excess shall, in every such case, be paid into the Treasury for the use of the United States.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

After "Boston," in line 2, insert "Portland, Maine." In line 3 strike out "four" and insert "six."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 2690.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2690. No collector, naval officer, surveyor, general appraiser, superintendent of warehouses, or appraisers, shall receive a compensation more than 25 per cent. greater than was paid to the officers and persons engaged in such services at the port of New York on the 14th day of June, 1858. This section, however, shall not be so construed as to increase the compensation of any officer of the customs or of any person engaged in the collection thereof.

The motion to strike out the section was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2678.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2678. The collectors for the districts in the State of North Carolina shall receive a salary of $1,000 a year each, in addition to the fees and commissions of office. Such compensation, however, shall in no case exceed the sum of $2,500 a year in the aggregate.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1, after the word "districts," insert "of Albemarle, Pamlico, Beaufort, and Wilmington." In line 3 strike out "and commissions."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2681.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2681. The collector for the district of Willamette shall receive a salary of $1,000 a year, with the fees allowed by law, and a commission on all customs money collected and accounted for by him; such salary, fees, and commissions not to exceed at the rate of $3,000 a year.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In line 5 strike out "at the rate of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2697.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2697. The deputy collectors at Eureka, Wilmington, and Vallejo, in California, shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year each.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the word "Wilmington," in line 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 2702.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2702. No deputy collector, unless provision is otherwise made, shall receive more than $1,000 in any one year for any services he may perform for the United States in any office or capacity.

The motion to strike out the section was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2701.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2701. The deputy collectors at Ellensberg, at the mouth of Rogue River, Port Orford, and out at Gardiner, shall receive a salary of $1,000 a year each.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the words "out at," before the word "Gardiner."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out sections 2703, 2707, and 2708.

The sections were as follows:

SEC. 2703. In addition to the fees and allowances provided by law, the naval officers for the districts of Wilmington, North Carolina, and Savannah shall receive a salary of $150 a year each.

SEC. 2707. No deputy naval officer in the port of Charleston or Savannah shall receive more than $1,500 a year as salary.

SEC. 2708. No deputy naval officer, unless provision is otherwise made, shall receive more than $1,000, in any one year, for any services he may perform for the United States in any office or capacity.

The motion to strike out the sections was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2706.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2706. The deputy naval officers at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, and Portland, in Maine, shall receive a salary of $2,500 a year each, payable out of the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In line 2, after "New Orleans," insert "San Francisco."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2743.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2743. No deputy surveyor at Charleston or Savannah shall receive more than $1,500 a year as salary, nor shall any other deputy surveyor, unless provision is otherwise made, receive more than $1,500, nor any other such deputy more than $1,000, in any one year, for any services he may perform for the United States in any office or capacity.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out the section, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2743. The deputy surveyor at Savannah shall receive as salary not more than $1,500 a year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2744.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2744. The principal appraisers at Savannah and Charleston shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year each. And when attending in a district other than that in which they reside, for the purpose of appraising any merchandise, they shall respectively receive at the rate of five dollars for every twenty-five miles in going to, or returning from, such district, in addition to the salary or pay provided for in this section.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all of the section after the words "a year each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2709.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2709. In addition to the allowances and fees otherwise provided by law, the surveyor at Eastport shall receive a salary of $500 a year; the surveyors at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, Newburyport, Gloucester, Suffolk, Smithfield, Richmond, and Fredericksburgh, in Virginia, Wilmington and Beaufort, in North Carolina, $250 a year each; the surveyor at Petersburgh $200 a year; the surveyors at Yeocomico, Hudson, Llewellensburgh, Portland in Maine, Pawkatuck, Stonington, Town Creek, West Point, Urbana, Windsor, Savannah, and Bermuda Hundred, $150 a year each; the surveyor at Port Royal, in Virginia, $250 a year; the surveyors of such ports as may be established by the President, and for whom no other salaries are provided, not exceeding $250 a year each.

Mr. POLAND. I move the following amendment:

In line 4 strike out "Suffolk, Smithfield, Richmond;" in line 5 strike out "Wilmington and Beaufort;" in line 6 strike out "in North Carolina;" in line 7 strike out "the surveyor at Petersburgh, $200 a year;" in line 8 strike out "Yeocomico, Hudson, Llewellensburgh;" in line 9 strike out "Pawkatuck, Town Creek, West Point, Urbana, Windsor;" in line 10 strike out "Bermuda Hundred," and insert "and" before "Savannah;" in lines 11 and 12 strike out "the surveyor at Port Royal, in Virginia, $250 a year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out sections 2711, 2712, 2713, and 2714.

The sections were as follows:

SEC. 2711. The surveyors at the ports in the district of Mobile shall receive, in addition to their other fees and emoluments, a salary of $250 a year each.

SEC. 2712. The surveyors at Cape Vincent, and at or near the mouth of the Rappahannock, in the district of Tappahannock, shall receive a salary of $200 a year each.

SEC. 2713. The surveyor for the district of Oswegatchie shall receive, in addition to the fees allowed by law, a salary of $150 a year.

SEC. 2714. The surveyors at the ports in the several districts embraced in the State of Florida shall receive, in addition to the fees and emoluments allowed by law, a salary of $300 a year each; except the surveyors at Pilatka and Bayport, who shall receive a salary of $350 a year each.

The motion to strike out the sections was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2715.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2715. The surveyors at the ports of Pittsburgh in Pennsylvania, Wheeling in West Virginia, Cincinnati in Ohio, Louisville in Kentucky, Saint Louis in Missouri, and Nashville in Tennessee, shall receive, in addition to the customary fees, a salary of $350 a year each.

Mr. POLAND. I move the following amendment:

Insert after "Missouri" the word "Memphis," and after "Tennessee" the words "Evansville, New Albany, Madison, and Jeffersonville in Indiana, Alton, Quincy, and Galena in Illinois; Burlington, Keokuk, and Dubuque in Iowa; Paducah in Kentucky; Selma in Alabama; Parkersburgh im West Virginia; Leavenworth in Kansas; Omaha in Nebraska; Saint Joseph and Kansas City in Missouri."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out sections 2718, 2719, 2722, and 2723.

The sections were as follows:

SEC. 2718. The surveyor at Memphis, in Tennessee, shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2719. The surveyors at Evansville and New Albany, in Indiana, shall receive, in addition to their fees, a salary of $350 a year each.

SEC. 2722. The surveyor at Alton, in Illinois, shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2723. The surveyors at Burlington and Galena, in Illinois, shall receive, in addition to their fees, a salary of $350 a year each.

The motion to strike out the sections was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out sections 2724, 2725, 2726, 2727, 2729, 2731, 2732, 2736, and 2737.

The sections were as follows:

SEC. 2724. The surveyor at Quincy, in Illinois, shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2725. The surveyor at Madison, in Indiana, shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2726. The surveyors at Paducah, in Kentucky, and Jeffersonville, in Indiana, shall receive, in addition to their fees, a salary of $350 a year each.

SEC. 2727. The surveyors at Keokuk and Dubuque, in Iowa, shall receive, in addition to their fees, a salary of $350 a year each.

SEC. 2729. The surveyor at Selma shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2731. The surveyor at Parkersburgh, in West Virginia, shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2732. The surveyor at Leavenworth, in Kansas, shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2736. The surveyor at Omaha, in Nebraska, shall receive, in addition to his fees, a salary of $350 a year.

SEC. 2737. The surveyors at Saint Joseph and Kansas, in Missouri, shall receive the same salary as is now provided, or which may hereafter be provided by law, for surveyors of the same grade.

Mr. POLAND. These various sections that we propose to strike out are all provided for by the list of names inserted in section 2715. The salaries are all the same, and there is special propriety in inserting them in that section, because there is a special provision in relation to all that class of surveyors. They have performed the duties of collectors at these various places, and they have an additional compensation that ordinary surveyors have not had. Therefore, in order to make it correct, they should have the same provision made for them which is found in section 2715.

The motion to strike out the sections was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 2745.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2745. The merchants who may be appointed to act as appraisers, as provided in section 2606, shall receive a compensation of five dollars a day while actually employed. And whenever attending in any district other than that in which they reside, for the purpose of appraising any merchandise, they shall receive at the rate of five dollars for every twenty-five miles in going to, or returning from, such district, in addition to the salary or pay provided for in this section.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out from lines 4 to 8 of that section, inclusive, and also to strike out section 2746.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 2748.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2748. The four general appraisers authorized by law shall receive a salary of $2,500 a year each, together with their actual traveling expenses, to be regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out the words, "a salary of $2,500 a year each, together with."

I will state that the salaries of these officers are provided for in another section. We leave this provision to stand to regulate the matter of traveling expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 2752.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I desire to offer is to section 2755.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2755. Each inspector shall receive, for every day he shall be actually employed in aid of the customs, a sum not exceeding four dollars; and for every other person that the collector may find it necessary and expedient to employ, as occasional inspector, or in any other way in aid of the revenue, a like sum, while actually so employed, not exceeding three dollars for every day so employed, to be paid by the collector out of the revenue and charged to the United States.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section by striking out the words, "to be paid by the collector out of the revenue and charged to the United States;" and also to strike out section 2756.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 2769.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2769. An additional compensation of 25 per cent. shall be continued to the customs officers at the port of San Francisco.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section, by striking out the words, "customs officers," and inserting in lieu thereof, "appraisers, deputy naval officers, and weighers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In this revision there was no revision by the commissioners of any portion of the laws relating to the District of Columbia. The committee determined that some of the more general statutes in relation to the District of Columbia, showing its organization and its connection with the General Government, ought to be revised, and they have therefore taken means to have so much of the statutes in relation to the District prepared to be inserted as an amendment; but it will be an amendment of so much length, that in order to be properly considered it should be printed. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have an amendment to offer to section 4252.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4252. Whenever any certificate of registry, enrollment, or license, or other record or document granted in lieu thereof, to any vessel, is knowingly and fraudulently obtained, or is used for any vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof, such vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be liable to forfeiture.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out the comma after the word "obtained;" and also the word "is" after the word "or."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 4279.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4279. Vessels used exclusively as ferry-boats, carrying passengers, baggage goods, wares, and merchandise, shall not be required to clear, nor shall the masters or persons in charge of such vessels be required to present manifests, or to pay clearance fees or fees for receiving or certifying manifests.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to insert after the words "required to" the words "enter and;" and in line 4, after the word "pay," to insert the words "entrance or."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next section to which I desire to offer an amendment is section 4315.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4315. The Secretary of the Treasury shall provide for the establishment of ten life-saving stations on the coasts of Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, Virginia, and North Carolina, at such points as he may deem necessary, for the saving of life and property on said coasts.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend that section by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That all life-saving stations hereafter erected shall be erected under the supervision of two captains of the revenue service, to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to be under his direction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at nine o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CROOKE: Several memorials of business men of Brooklyn, New York, in favor of amendments to the bankrupt law and protesting against its repeal, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CROSSLAND: A paper for a post-route from the mouth of Mayfield's Creek, in Ballard County, Kentucky, to Woodville, in McCracken County, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ELKINS: The petition of William S. McKnight and James W. Richardson, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HARRISON: The petition of Jacob Bloomstein, of Nashville, Tennessee, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of Sarah W. Wilson, of Davidson County, Tennessee, widow of John Wilson, deceased, for salary due her husband as inspector of steamboats, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of Anderson Davis, of Trenton, Gibson County, Tennessee, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. E. R. HOAR: The petition of 176 judges and lawyers of Alabama, for the passage of an act explanatory of the act of March 3, 1873, in relation to the district and circuit courts of Alabama, to the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

By Mr. KELLEY: The memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, for a revision of the customs-revenue laws, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin: The petition of John Phillips and others, of Wisconsin. for the completion of the work now in progress of opening water-communication between the Mississippi River and the Great Lakes by the way of Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, for an extension of the time for the construction of the railroad from the Saint Croix River or Lake to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. ORR: A paper for the establishment of a post-route from Wolfdale to Oto, in Woodbury County, Iowa, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 6, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden; and

A bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to Senate resolution of December 9, 1873, a statement of the amounts paid to collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and detectives engaged in the customs service, on account of distributive shares of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, for the ten years ending June 30, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, to inquire into the propriety of printing the letter and accompanying documents.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Postmaster-General, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of January 30, 1874, calling for information relative to the postal-car service between New York and Washington, New York and Boston, and New York, Albany, Buffalo, and Suspension Bridge; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relative to the North Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the passage of a law to refund to the city of Milwaukee certain moneys advanced for the construction of the straight-cut harbor at Milwaukee; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an extension of the time for the construction of the railroad from the Saint Croix River to Lake Superior and Bayfield; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of Kewaunee Harbor, in Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of bankers, merchants, and numerous other citizens of Michigan, protesting against any increase of an irredeemable currency, and praying for the speedy resumption of specie payments; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FENTON. I present resolutions of the Academy of Medicine, Medical Library and Journal Association, and the American Medical Association of New York, in relation to the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army. These resolutions are signed by the officers of these respective associations; and I infer from the first sentence of the proceedings of the Medical Library and Journal Association of New York that it is intended that I should present these papers to the Senate, and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorials will be so referred.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, representing that the customs laws are confused, and difficult to understand, and that the proceedings of informers and Government officers acting under these laws have been high-handed and offensive to the moral sense of the mercantile community, and injurious to the Government itself, which has thereby been brought into disrepute. They pray, therefore, that Congress will revise and amend those laws so that honest importers may not be injured in property and reputation by proceedings instigated by men who are actuated by the hope of pecuniary profit to themselves rather than desire to promote the public good. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of a large number of citizens of Boston interested in inventions, in which they set forth at some length that a patent association has recently been organized at Boston, under the title of the "United States Patent Association," mentioning the names of the officers, the president, directors, and others, and representing them as engaged in pressing upon Congress legislation affecting patents which these petitioners regard as contrary to the public interests, as they contemplate the extension of patents through the Commissioner in a way likely to be, according to these petitioners, an abuse. Accordingly they pray that Congress will reconsider this matter, of such vital importance to the whole public, and they pray that no further extensions be granted except as are now provided by law. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of Charles H. Hubbard, administrator of the estate of Joseph S. Hubbard, deceased, a resident of Hickman, in the State of Kentucky, praying compensation for ninety-four hogsheads of sugar seized by the United States during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Sarah E. Weston, widow, and George Weston and Imogen Weston Rolfe, children of William K. Weston, deceased, praying compensation for the construction of a light-house in New York Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT presented a resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, asking the establishment of a district court of the United States, and a distributing post-office at the city of Fort Wayne, and for the erection of a suitable building for the purposes contemplated by the resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, aad ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of P. H. Breslin, late captain Eighteenth United States Infantry, asking to be relieved from liability on account of loss of public moneys from embezzlement by a clerk in his office; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the chiefs and head-men of the Oneida Nation of Indians, residing in the county of Madison, New York, touching their lands; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWE presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking that if any assistance is hereafter granted to Pacific Railroads, provision shall be inserted requiring a more direct branch to be constructed between Sioux City and the Union Pacific Railroad, east of the Rocky Mountains; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of Congress refunding to the city of Milwaukee certain moneys advanced for the construction of the straight-cut harbor at Milwaukee; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Chloe Ann Ketcham, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. I present the petition of 201 business men, manufacturers, and citizens of the city of Paxton, Illinois; also a petition, with a letter in connection with it, from iron merchants in Chicago, (whether all the iron merchants have signed it I do not know, but the letter says "the iron merchants,") signed by 40 or 50 merchants engaged in that business in Chicago; also a petition of citizens of Illinois, without stating the town; also a petition—I have not counted, but I should say about 200 names—of the small traders and other citizens of a portion of the city of Chicago; also the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Peoria, Illinois, signed by its president and secretary, all praying for an increase of the currency, and asking their members of Congress so to vote. I move the reference of these petitions and this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of David F. Taylor, late of Company M, Ninth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, praying to be granted a pension from the 30th of June, 1865, to September 30, 1872, at the rate of five dollars per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. B. Jeter and others, trustees of the Richmond Female Institute, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of the institute building by officers of the United States Army in 1865 and 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the petition of J. W. Graham and 196 others, citizens of Utah, praying the passage of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad bill; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. PRATT. I hold in my hand the proceedings of a large and influential public meeting, held in the city of Indianapolis, the capital of my State, which is a city of some 75,000 inhabitants, and full of business, activity, enterprise, and intelligence; and they have adopted certain resolutions on the financial question, which I beg leave to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be so referred.

Mr. PRATT. I ask that the resolutions be read at the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

1. That the recent commercial crisis, while it demonstrated the soundness of our currency and the faith of the public in its value, also demonstrated that its volume was inadequate to the actual substantial demands of legitimate trade.

2. That in the opinion of this meeting it is the duty of Congress, as speedily as practicable, to provide for an increase of currency commensurate with the demands of the usual business of the country, and to establish such a system as will accommodate itself to the growth of our commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests in the future.

3. That by spasmodic and untimely efforts at resumption of specie payments the growth of our resources will be crippled, and the date of real resumption will be correspondingly postponed, and we believe that legislation at this time looking to such resumption would be unwise.

4. That we approve the position of our Senators and Representatives in Congress in the objects embraced in the foregoing resolutions, and urge them to persevere until the financial relief demanded by the Northwest is obtained.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of citizens of Carroll County, Illinois, in favor of an act of Congress authorizing the Secretary of War to construct a canal from Hennepin on the Illinois River, to Rock Island on the Mississippi, with such navigable feeder thereto from Rock River as may be necessary; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the granting of Government aid for the construction of the North Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in relation to the North Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw the papers referred to the Committee on Military Affairs with the bill (S. No. 264) for the relief of the Fourth and Fifth Indian regiments, copies being retained.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That two petitions of citizens of Virginia, praying appropriations for the improvement of Quantico Creek and Neabsco Creek and Bay, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and returned to Mr. E. M. Willis.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That the report of the immigrant inquiry commission, Senate Executive Document No. 23, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BOGY. Yesterday I introduced a bill (S. No. 577) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River, which, by reference to the RECORD this morning, I perceive was referred to the Committee on Commerce. It should be referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes, and not to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change of reference will be made, if there be no objection.

THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have received a communication from the Congressional Printer, calling attention to certain charges that have been made against him in the conduct of his office, and stating that he is a sworn officer of this body, elected by it, and primarily responsible to it, and he conceives it to be his duty, and he thinks that the Senate will concede that it is his right, to explain the reasons in part why these charges have been made; and I am requested by him to ask that the deposition, which I now send to the Chair, may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the deposition of H. H. Clapp.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think it is unusual to read such a paper. I think it is a bad example, too. I hardly think it the privilege of anybody outside of this Chamber to be heard through a speech or otherwise, and it is certainly a bad example.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not press it against the wish of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that that paper be received and referred to the Committee on Printing. Of course, if there is any injustice done, that committee will examine into it and report to the Senate. It ought not to go into the RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to its being printed; but why should it go into the RECORD?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly it ought to go into the RECORD. The accusation is before the public.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How is the accusation before the public? If we are to allow every gentlemen who feels that he is assailed by the newspaper press to come in here and spread his defense upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I think we shall have enough to attend to. I am certain that it is unusual for such a thing to be done, and it seems to me pretty clear that it is not a good example to set. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Printing, and printed.

Mr. HOWE. I thought I could see, myself, a difference between allowing an officer of this body to reply to a public assault on his official conduct, and allowing everybody in the United States to do the same thing. To do the latter might produce a bulky record of the proceedings of the Senate, but to do the former I hope will not produce a record unusually bulky. It seems to me that every officer of the Senate should have this privilege accorded him. I know nothing about the assault; I know nothing about this reply to it. I have not seen it. I only understand that an officer of the Senate asks that he may be allowed to make a statement here in reply to assaults which have been made upon him. I do not think it is much to accord him, and I do not think we should ordinarily decline to accord it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to refer this paper to the Committee on Printing, and that it be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say one word. The motion of my honorable friend from Maine implies that, without knowing what this paper is at all, we are to receive it, we are to refer it to a committee, and we are to print it; and that motion is made as an objection to the only proceeding by which we can be informed as to what it is. It seems to me that if the paper is a proper one to be presented it is a proper one to be treated at least like a petition, so that the Senator presenting it may inform us in as condensed form as he chooses of its contents, or that he may have it read in order that we may know its contents; and I quite agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin, that when an officer of this body is publicly arraigned in respect of misconduct in the official place which he holds at the instance and pleasure of the Senate, it is quite right not only that he should make any statement, but that he should make it to the Senate itself. I do not understand my honorable friend from Maine to impeach that position; but he says it is better for us to take this paper blindly without knowing what it is and incur the expense of printing it, and refer it to a committee, all for the purpose of avoiding either our being informed by the Senator who presents it of the substance of its contents or our spending two or three minutes in hearing it read. I think the better course would be to let us know what it is, unless the honorable Senator has some special objection to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My objection is that it is not receivable under the rules in any sense whatever.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it not receivable as a petition?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; it is not receivable as a petition. It does not pretend to be a petition; it is not addressed to the Senate or the Congress of the United States. It is simply an affidavit which this man has chosen to make and hand in here to have read.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is made by his deputy.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is made by his deputy. That is further off still.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is by his deputy of course, but it is his defense.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not an official paper in any sense.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Clapp has been sick, but he is convalescent, and this deposition is made by his chief clerk. If it is proper to be read at all, it is made by the proper person, because the deposition is by the only person who is cognizant of the act which is deposed to, and who was acting for the Congressional Printer in his absence. I have not favored the reading of papers generally; but it seemed to me that this being from an officer of the Senate it had a special privilege, and that there should be no objection about its not being addressed to the Senate, because it is addressed to me as the chairman of the committee with which he is in the most intimate relations, with a request that I would place it before the Senate; and it might have been proper for me to put a heading to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator can read it if he chooses.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not read it against the wish of the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But this man is not privileged to have it read and go into the records of the Senate. That is my point; and I make it of course not out of any wish to prejudice the document at all, but I submit that it is an evil example to allow miscellaneous papers to come in here. Somebody is accused of a failure of duty, and he, or somebody on his behalf, thinks he is doing a smart thing by replying to it through the mouth of some Senator and so getting it to the public. I submit that is not a good example.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Maine to object to the reading of the paper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Allow me to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate, and it must be decided, under the rule, without debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Maine, I hope, will withdraw the motion long enough to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think this ought to be put on the basis of somebody being assailed and coming here to defend himself. It is an officer of the Senate who is assailed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So I understand in this case.

Mr. ANTHONY. An officer that is responsible to us, and who is assailed for doing that which, if it was true, would subject him to removal by this body; and that being placed before the whole community, and repeatedly, he thought we would consider it his right—at all events he deemed it his duty to submit to us what he considers the explanation and the reason of the assault made upon him. I certainly do not wish to have this read if it is against the will of the Senate; but I cannot think that it stands upon the same basis as an ordinary communication. I think that a communication from an officer of our own body has a certain privilege, not exactly like that of a Senator who has a personal explanation to make, but differing from it in degree rather than in quality.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator whether in his judgment the Congressional Printer, when he has put the facts into the possession of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, under whose supervision this gentleman discharges all his duties, has not secured all the rights he can possibly receive by having this read. If the Senator really desires to have this read, I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. As it has been presented—although I would not have presented it if I had thought it would be objectionable on the part of any Senator—and the reading has commenced, I think it had better be finished. ["No," "no."] It will not take more than two minutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I withdraw the objection, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the paper be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 224) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 129) concerning and authorizing the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to extend and construct their railroad into the District of Columbia, and through the States of West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to the city of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, and a branch road from any point they may elect on the main line of their road, in the State of Indiana, to the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, of Eastport, Maine, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmenter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 519) to grant an American register to the Canadian tug Noah P. Sprague, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 401) to establish a uniform registry of sea-going vessels, to afford protection to life on shipboard, and to govern rebates in duties on merchandise damaged on the voyage of importation, reported adversely, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Dr. William Trevitt, former United States consul at Valparaiso, Chili, asking payment of salary and clerk hire, reported adversely; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Curtis, of Florida, praying compensation as master and pilot of the schooner James Buchanan, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands or any legal subdivision of the same, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 464) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Howard, widow of Thomas H. Howard, late of Company K, Fifth United States Veteran Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 524) to protect timber lands of the United States Government reservations and lands purchased for the United States, reported it without amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ISAAC STROHM, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2224) appropriating $1,400 to pay the operators in the departmental telegraph connected with the two Houses of Congress.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2224) making appropriations to pay the operators of the Government telegraph connecting the Departments with the two Houses of Congress.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 581) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to set apart a certain tract of land lying near the head-waters of the Yellowstone River as a public park," approved March 1, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 582) for the relief of A. B. Fisher; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 584) providing for the permanent location of the southern terminus of the Oregon Central Railroad, and to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 585) for the relief of Oliver Moses, Frank D. Moses, Galen C. Moses, Charles Owen, and Robert P. Manson, all of Bath, and George W. Edge, of Richmond, Maine, owners of the ship John Carver; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 586) to create a port of delivery at Helena, in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. THURMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. THURMAN. As the bill proposes an appropriation, I suppose it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the bill read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill at length; which appropriates $10,000 for the expenses of the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio what are the objects to which this money is to be devoted.

Mr. THURMAN. To pay witnesses; to pay the clerk; to pay the stenographer; to pay copyists—the usual expenses of an investigating committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I supposed that there were no witnesses before the committee except those who reside in the city of Washington; and the fee is very small; if I remember aright it is half a dollar a day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Two dollars a day.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Maine says two dollars a day. So I was wrong about that. The attendance of witnesses of course would not account for this sum at all, unless they should be witnesses from a distance involving mileage. The copying of papers, it seems to me, would hardly suggest such a sum; and I should like to inquire of the Senator are copies of all the papers to which I see reference made in the public journals—the answer of the governor and the accompaniments—paid for by Congress?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; the copying is not paid for. They are sent here. The printing is to be paid for.

Mr. CONKLING. But this appropriation would not relate to that.

Mr. THURMAN. Of course not.

Mr. CONKLING. I rose not to object to this bill, but to get some information, which I have no doubt the Senator is quite willing I should get, and to call attention to the fact that an investigation being directed of matters almost under the eaves of the Capitol, there being no expenses which would naturally occur to one except the small fees paid to witnesses and the services of the stenographer, we are beginning by an appropriation which looks to the devotion of $10,000 as the first sum to this work. Now, unless we are to pay counsel fees, unless we are to pay something which does not ordinarily enter into an investigation, it seems to me that this amount is large and that the action is rather early.

A memorial was presented here by persons living in this city showing a great deal of interest in the matter. I take it for granted they are ready to employ their own counsel; and I had supposed from the feeling evinced that citizens here would be ready to go before a committee and give information on the subject without having the process of the Senate to go, and an officer employed to subpœna them, and pay them fees, though of course I do not know how that is. I think it is well to take note as we go along that even inquiries so simple and immediate as this seem to draw to themselves considerations involving great expense. Of course if it is necessary we ought to vote for it. I can only express my disappointment that it is so. I supposed the committee would be aided by persons interested enough in this subject to furnish them facts on both sides, and that the District authorities would pay for the copying of their own papers, as far as it was necessary to copy them; and that those adverse would do what was necessary to enable the committee to conduct this investigation, without doing it as if it was a thing compulsory as to both sides, and as if we were to get by main force all the information that is to come. Of course, if that is it, money must be voted; but I think it is rather disappointing that it should take that form.

Mr. THURMAN. It is only necessary for me to say that if the $10,000 are not needed they will not be expended. I do not suppose the Senator from New York imagines that the committee intend to waste the money, or throw it away, or give it away. As to the amount, I think from some experience which I have had on committees of investigation that the amount, instead of being too large, is moderate enough to ask for. I cannot undertake to say how far this investigation may extend. It would not be proper that I should do so. All I know is that if it is the intention of Congress to have what its resolution imports, a thorough investigation, it is right that the committee should have the means to make such an investigation.

Mr. CONKLING. I quite agree with what the Senator says; but I venture to remark that I have never known, myself, and I cannot recall, an instance of an appropriation of this sort which was not all used. If you appropriate $10,000, I think the Senator will find importunities for various expenses which might never be proposed at all if the appropriation had not been made. I do not know but that if we appropriate $10,000, it may be suggested that we ought to pay counsel fees on one side or on the other.

Mr. THURMAN. Nobody dreams of such a thing.

Mr. CONKLING. I presume not now; but if the money is appropriated everybody will consider what is to be done with it. Ten thousand dollars are to be appropriated. Who is to have it? Although, as the Senator says, in theory it need not be expended because it is appropriated, yet I am inclined to think, in practice, that all you appropriate on such occasions is expended. I only call attention to it, not to object to it. On the contrary, I agree that we should vote all the money that is necessary to make this investigation a thorough one. But I cannot help regretting the fact that at this time it is necessary to start with $10,000 in order to find out from men who seem to be anxious to communicate their information, and who live within the sound of a whistle from the place where the committee is sitting.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not my business to speak about what these memorialists may do or may not do, or can do or cannot do. Nobody pretends that they are all the witnesses, or that other witnesses will not have to be examined, and have to be sent for, possibly some of them sent for at a distance. These memorialists do not profess that they are the witnesses to prove all these matters. In respect to the suggestion about counsel fees, there is nothing in that. Not a dollar of the money can be paid except by order of the committee; and if Congress has not sufficient confidence in the committee to intrust them with such a sum of money, they had better dispense with the committee altogether.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRINTING OF A COMMUNICATION.

Mr. RAMSEY. There was a communication received this morning in answer to a resolution of the Senate from the Post-Office Department, and ordered to be printed. I neglected at the time to ask that two hundred copies be printed for the use of the Post-Office Department. I make that motion now.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ART EXHIBITION AT VIENNA.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate the report made by Professor E. M. Gallaudet on the exhibition of art made at Vienna during the late exposition.

TRANSPORTATION FROM WEST TO EAST.

Mr. RAMSEY. A day or two since I offered a resolution, which is lying over, giving certain instructions to the Committee on Transportation. I should like to call it up now and submit a few remarks to the Senate in explanation of my views.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. RAMSEY on the 4th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board be instructed to consider and report upon the expediency of improving water and railway communications from the Mississippi Valley to the sea-board, and to regulate commerce among the States by cheapening transportation between the East and West, by improving the navigation of the Mississippi River from its source to the Gulf of Mexico, and the lake navigation from Lake Superior to Lake Ontario; and by chartering a double-track freight railroad from the Mississippi River to the ocean at the low maximum rate of six mills a ton a mile.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, in the year 1873 there were over twenty-two million bushels of wheat raised in the State of Minnesota for exportation, besides oats, meats, butter, cheese, and other products of the soil, amounting in the whole to nearly one million tons. This represents the annual surplus product or income of the State.

The average price of transporting a bushel of wheat from Saint Paul to Chicago, and thence by water to New York, during that year, was about forty cents, if sent by all rail fifty-seven cents.

It is said, and I believe it is true, that grain can be moved from the State to tide-water for one-half the present charges. If this is so, and if reduction in freights to this extent could be made, it would be equivalent to bringing the wheat lands of Minnesota within six hundred miles of New York, or as near as those of Ohio now are. If the entire saving should inure to the benefit of the producing classes, it would add nearly $8,000,000 to their annual income. A similar state of facts applies to a greater or less extent to all grain-growing States in the valley of the Mississippi. Their growth has been crippled, the rise of their real estate retarded, their ability to expand limited by the high rates of transportation they are compelled to pay; and unless these can be so reduced as to increase the return to the farmer and a fair profit on the products of the soil, they may be prematurely forced into manufactures, to the injury certainly of the East.

The merchants and manufacturers of New England and the Middle States who seek a market for their wares in the West, and the railroads that transport for both the East and West, have as great an interest in this subject as the western farmers. To both, the question of cheap transportation, which is now agitating the West more than any political question, is one of vital interest, for upon it depends the present and future prosperity of both grain-growing and manufacturing States. Some plan must be at once devised by which the western farmer can send his products to a safe and large market at a reasonable cost, and receive a good return for his labors.

The subject of the ways and means of securing cheap transportation claims, therefore, to be brought before Congress, and its serious consideration to be urged until the desired relief has been attained. For the accomplishment of this object four plans have been proposed:

First. To improve the navigation of the Mississippi River from the Falls of Saint Anthony to the Gulf of Mexico, so as to give a sufficient depth of water to enable steamboats to tow barges of large capacity down the river to New Orleans, and for steam and sailing ships from New Orleans to the Gulf.

Second. The construction of a canal from the head-waters of the Ohio, or its branches, to connect with tide-water on the Atlantic.

Third. The deepening of the channels between the lakes, the widening and deepening of the Welland Canal, and the canals on the river Saint Lawrence, to deep water at Montreal, or through Lake Champlain to New York.

Fourth. The cheapening of transportation by rail.

These water-ways cannot be opened without the expenditure of large sums of money, which must be made by Congress upon the waters within our jurisdiction; for there is no way by which private parties could be authorized to do it, and be permitted to farm out the work so constructed, and to take toll upon vessels passing up and down our rivers.

The right of Congress to make appropriation for harbors, and for the improvement of river navigation, under the clause of the Constitution authorizing it "to regulate commerce," has not only never been questioned, but has been constantly exercised ever since the Republic was formed. If, therefore, the benefit to commerce, or the "facilities afforded to commerce," in the words of Mr. Calhoun, advocating an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River, be the end to be secured by the appropriation for the improvement of water-ways, there can be no reason why the same means may not be used to secure the same end in whatever way it can be best accomplished.

The clause of the Constitution above referred to, under which appropriations for the benefit of commerce have been made, includes the erection of light-houses, the construction of breakwaters, the deepening and extending of harbors, the dredging and deepening of rivers, the construction of the national road, as well as grants of public lands and money for the construction of railroads.

The constitutional rights of Congress under this clause have been so fully elaborated by other Senators, and will be so clearly and ably elucidated by my colleague in the report which he will soon make upon the subject of transportation, that I shall not occupy the time of the Senate on this point.

The republican party has by its acts in the past demonstrated that it was the party of progress. It has made appropriations of land and money for the improvement of our rivers and the construction of railways to open up the West. When sufficient encouragement had been given to railroads to secure the development of the country in that way, further expenditures were stopped.

These Territories have become populous States, raising large quantities of produce; and a demand has arisen for cheap transportation from these lands to the East, which the existing railroads are unable to furnish. As the party of progress, that new want requires of us that we should be prepared for the emergency which has arisen and take proper steps to meet it.

The House has confirmed these views, and by the large vote of 171 to 64 has—

Resolved, That it is within the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, and that the present condition and magnitude of the commerce among these States are such as to demand the prompt and wise exercise of the power and duty declared in the preceding resolution.

That its judgment is correct must be apparent to every one who reflects upon the subject, and considers the result which would ensue if Congress had no power to regulate freight, and if each State had supreme control over all commerce passing through its territory. If Illinois could impose a tax upon through freights traversing that State, or if railroads chartered by that State could increase the rates of freight to whatever sum they pleased, she could cut off Minnesota from all access by railroad to the ocean. The mere statement of this point is sufficient to show the absolute necessity for Congress alone to control the subject. While the West has already nearly three hundred million bushels of grain seeking an eastern market, the East has as many million dollars of her manufactures looking to a western market. The desire of each is to exchange its surplus products for those of the other section. These exchanges constitute commerce. It can be facilitated by the cheapening of transportation more easily than in any other way.

It seems to be well settled, by the experience of Great Britain and America, that a permanent reduction of rates on railroads by competition has never been obtained, since competition is invariably followed by combination.

It is the opinion of the recent parliamentary commission that competition can possibly be maintained by means of rivalry between water-ways and railways. This opinion is corroborated by the fact that the instant competition by rail and water between Chicago and New York is created by reason of the opening of navigation, the charges by rail are greatly reduced by the different lines of railway, to be raised again when competition ceases in the fall by the closing of navigation.

It is feasible by the expenditure of a moderate sum of money to dam up the waters of the Upper Mississippi and thus provide a supply during the dry seasons of the year. As this is a novel and important view of the subject, I will quote a few sentences from the report of General Warren, of the Engineer Corps, to General Humphreys. He says:

In the summer of 1869 Mr. Frank Cook, civil engineer, under my direction, visited the head-waters of the Mississippi River, made a partial survey of the lakes, rivers, &c., with a view of ascertaining if reservoirs could be made, in which should be stored up the surplus waters of the rainy season for use during the low water. At Pokegama, Pine River, and Mille Lacs, the estimate of the aggregate cost of works, to utilize these bodies of water, is $114,000, and the aggregate capacity of the reservoirs, when they were completed, as estimated by Mr. Cook, was 54,006,872,830 cubic feet. According to the measurements of the Mississippi in 1867, the volume of discharge at Saint Paul on a two-foot navigable stage, is 6,500 cubic feet per second; at a three-foot navigable stage, 8,100 cubic feet per second; at a four-foot navigable stage, 10,500 cubic feet per second; at a five-foot navigable stage, 14,000 cubic feet per second. The waters from these reservoirs would supply, at Saint Paul, a difference between a two-foot and a three-foot navigable stage for 390 days; a difference between a two and a four foot navigable stage for 156 days, and the difference between a two and a five foot navigable stage for 83 days. It would do as much above the Falls of Saint Anthony.

The longest period of low water at Saint Paul was in 1864, when it was for one hundred and fifty days below the three-foot stage, and part of the time below two feet. It is believed that these reservoirs would have maintained the river at a four-foot navigable stage even during this period. Thus it will be perceived that if these reservoirs can be created and controlled, a four-foot navigable stage would be secured throughout the most unfavorable seasons.

For the completion of this plan it would be necessary to open a ship-canal from New Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico, or, rather, from some point below that city, or in some other way remove the obstacles which now obstruct the navigation of the Mississippi River. This, with the prosecution of the works now under way upon the river, will open the Mississippi, and with the capacious route through the lakes, via Du Luth, will give our produce large facilities to reach the markets of the world by the cheapest possible mode of transit. This plan of improving the river, valuable and absolutely necessary as it is, does not meet all our wants. The Mississippi above the Ohio is closed by ice a portion of every year, and there is no great demand for our wheat in the South. The cotton States require only from fifty to seventy-five million bushels of wheat in a year, and the entire quantity annually shipped to Europe is only about twenty-five million bushels.

There is no market at New Orleans capable at all times of purchasing any and all wheat to be shipped from the West, while in the East there is an enormous home consumption greatly exceeding any foreign demand, and a ready market at all seasons and on every day in the year for every bushel of grain to be sold.

Similar considerations apply with equal force to show that a canal across Virginia or Tennessee could not satisfy the reasonable demands of the West; in addition, the expense of such a canal would be very great, probably much exceeding the cost of opening both of the other water-ways herein proposed, while it would be closed by ice for a portion of every year.

There is no doubt that the Welland Canal and those on the river Saint Lawrence will be deepened and enlarged at the expense of the Canadian government, and a water-way thus made from Lake Huron to the ocean. But this will be of comparatively little benefit to the great Northwest until the canal at the Sault Sainte Marie, connecting the waters of Lake Superior with Lake Huron, shall have been deepened and enlarged sufficiently for the passage of the largest class of vessels navigating the lakes. The vast and generous grants of land that the United States have made to the railroads of the Northwest can only be availed of to their fullest capacity when means are provided for reaching a market.

But even this mode of relief does not give us all we want. The lakes and the Saint Lawrence are closed by ice for several months in the year, while our farmers require access to the markets at all times, that they may sell their grain when the prices are the highest or when they wish to realize.

Railways are preferred by many to internal water-ways for the carriage of grain. This is shown by the fact that, with rates from Chicago to the sea-board, on an average for a series of years, nearly one-third higher by rail than by water, the entire capacity of the railroads has been taxed to the utmost extent; and that, while the tonnage on the New York railways has increased over 120 per cent. within ten years, the tonnage on the Erie Canal has increased only 20 per cent.

If these views are correct, the solution of the question must be found in creating a rivalry between water-ways and railways between the South and the East, improving the navigation of the Mississippi and the lakes, and in new railroad communications between the East and West.

Questions of fictitious issues of stock and bonds, and of unjust and oppressive tolls, are of very great importance, and demand careful investigation; and wherever they are found to exist, there a reform should be made at once. But these questions, though of great importance in themselves, are in reality of minor importance when compared with such low rates on grain to the East as will enable us to market all our produce. There is no doubt that the railroads as at present operated are unable to move freight at rates that will afford relief. There is scarcely a single east and west road where the actual operating expenses for moving its freight are not higher than the rates should be; consequently they cannot make the necessary reduction of rates.

There have been built in Minnesota nineteen hundred miles of railroad, at an expense of over $80,000,000; there has never been paid a single dollar in dividends on this large amount of capital, but on the contrary one hundred and eighty-seven miles of these roads are in the hands of a receiver, and proceedings commenced to foreclose the mortgage upon them. Eight hundred and thirty miles more have been unable to earn money enough to pay the interest on their debt. It is believed that the same general statement of facts is true of the roads of several of the other Western States.

But, besides the high rates, the railroads have not sufficient capacity to move any great additional quantity of freight. Only about one-tenth of the grain that is raised finds its way to tide-water at New York. Sixty-one per cent. of this goes by the Erie Canal, 25 per cent. by the Erie, 12 per cent. by the New York Central, and 2 per cent. by the Pennsylvania Central Railroad; yet these roads have even now more than they can do. The West could easily have sent twice the quantity it shipped last year if there had been a large foreign demand; but the railroads would have been incapable of transporting it. A very slight addition to the quantity moved would have raised the rates of the whole freight to such an extent that the farmers would not have realized any greater profits from the increased quantity forwarded. To the railroads would have accrued any additional profits from a great foreign demand, and not to the producing class.

The action of two distinct tribunals is necessary in all the Western States to afford the required relief to the farming interest.

The collection of grain from the different sections of a State, and its transportation to the water-ways or the trunk lines, belongs to the local and branch roads, and relief from burdensome tolls must be sought in State legislation. It is said that rates on railroads terminating at Du Luth, on Lake Superior, discriminate against freight to that port, and thereby grain is forced to an all-rail route to Milwaukee or Chicago. Here is an instance where only State legislation can afford relief.

It has been said that congressional interference is not required in Minnesota. I should heartily rejoice if this was the case. But I know the people of Minnesota will not and should not be satisfied with only the present water communications by Lake Superior and the Mississippi River, closed as they are by ice for several months of the year, when they can have by the action of Congress the water-routes greatly improved and freights reduced, and an all-rail communication, all the year through, at as low rates of freight as the lake routes now give.

State legislation cannot regulate the action nor authorize the construction of a single mile of railroad beyond its territorial limits. Congress alone has jurisdiction, and can "regulate commerce" among the States.

The old Confederation had no power over commerce among the States. Our forefathers, perceiving its defects in this respect, foreseeing the great difficulties that must arise from constant conflicts from this source, gave up the Confederation of States, with State sovereignty, and made a more "perfect Union" for the people of the United States. Each State surrendered to the Congress of the United States the right to regulate interstate commerce within its own territory, and obtained the right for Congress to regulate it through every other State—an inestimable boon to every western farmer.

It has been said "that the burden of extortionate tolls falls eventually on the consumer." While, as a general proposition, this is true, it is entirely inapplicable to this case, and any legislation proceeding on this theory will fail of giving relief.

The price of wheat is fixed in London. If large crops are raised in Russia, Central Europe, and America, and prices fall in London, this fact is immediately telegraphed to New York and Saint Paul, and regulates the prices. The price of wheat at each of these places is the London price, less the freight charges. If it falls in London two cents a bushel, the farmer in Minnesota or Iowa receives just so much less; if it rises, the farmer should receive the benefit. But as railroads establish the rates, they frequently raise them with the increase of the price and demand, and thus generally gain the benefit at the expense of the farmer.

It is our duty to legislate so that equal justice shall be dealt to all; that the producer shall be fully protected in his rights, freed from all unreasonable demands of railroads, and that property vested in railroads be secured in its rights.

A commission for establishing rates on the existing roads has been proposed, but cannot afford the relief we need. The mere inspection of the map is sufficient to show how the western roads radiate from two or three great western centers, and that the hundreds of roads in the West, now open to the public, have no other outlet than the four trunk roads that were in operation twenty years ago. Where they had only millions of bushels of wheat to move, we are called upon to provide for the transportation of hundreds of millions of bushels, and to feed the millions of Great Britain with our surplus products.

It is impossible to adapt an old system, devised for the day of small things, to our present wants. Nor would new roads, constructed and operated on the old system, doing a mixed business of express and local passenger trains, and through and local freight trains, each kind of business adding to the expense and hindering the movement of the other kinds, be sufficient. The only way we can meet the present needs of the country is by a change in the system.

To move the freight by railroad from the extreme West to the East at low rates we must have a double-track freight road, with low grades, large curves, steel rails, and suitable equipment, where immense quantities of freight can be kept moving at a slow and regular speed, day and night, without intermission or interruption. One such road, we are informed by competent engineers, would be sufficient, with the lake and river navigation, to transport all the freight to be moved for years to come. The rates could be reduced one-half from Minnesota and every other grain-growing State in the Mississippi Valley to tide-water.

From 1853 to 1862, 23 per cent. of the imports of wheat into Great Britain were from the United States, and 16 per cent. from Russia. The ocean freights were then 13.7 cents per bushel, and the largest proportion was transported in American bottoms. From 1863 to 1872 the United States supplied 29 per cent., Russia 32 per cent. The ocean freights were 17.24 cents, and the largest proportion was transported in English steamships, our vessels having been driven from the ocean. Once again our commerce is beginning to revive; already a line of American-built steamers sail weekly from Philadelphia to Liverpool. Iron steamships are being built on the Delaware, and wooden sailing ships in Maine. We may soon expect to see our flag again floating on the breeze in every foreign port, and with reduced inland and ocean freights our wheat must supply the demand of Great Britain to the exclusion of all foreign markets.

The following measures should be adopted in order to give adequate relief:

First. The Mississippi River must be made amply navigable from the Falls of Saint Anthony to the Gulf of Mexico.

Secondly. All the canals must be enlarged, and all obstructions removed from the head of Lake Superior to tide-water.

Thirdly. The West must be connected with the East by a double-track freight railroad, to be constructed either by Congress, which must build a road to be operated by parties furnishing their own equipment at a maximum rate per mile, established by Congress, or, which is preferable, by Congress chartering a corporation to construct a road from the East to the West, on condition that the freight shall not exceed certain low maximum rates, and giving this company the right to run over, or to have its cars hauled over, connecting roads, at rates to be fixed by commissioners if the parties are unable to agree, thus giving easy access to every section of the West.

In the year 1866 I introduced a bill into the Senate for an appropriation for the survey of the waters of the Upper Mississippi River, which led to the passage of the acts under which the first appropriations were made for improving its navigation.

It fell to my lot in former years to advocate the passage of certain acts by which lands were donated to Minnesota for railroads, to enable them to construct lines of railway through that State. The results of these appropriations for both water-ways and railways are witnessed in the population that has flowed into our State, in the industry that has tilled our fields, producing from them more wheat per capita than is raised by a like population in any other section of the world. I know no reason why I should not now vote for further appropriation for perfecting the work then begun, which has resulted so auspiciously heretofore, and which when completed will realize the fruition of our hopes.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the debate upon this bill shows one fact conclusively, that the Senate will not allow a measure of so much importance, bearing so hard upon the Treasury as it must, to be passed through without full consideration, and without understanding its scope, objects, and effects. One advantage which the debate has had is that the friends of the measure have shown just what they require; at any rate, have made an advance over their former positions. We now learn that the question of invitations sent to foreign powers is rather a minor consideration. In fact, it has been contended on this floor that the invitation has gone out, assimilating the case to that of a Senator who should issue cards stating that he would be at home on a certain day, which would be regarded as an invitation to those receiving the cards to visit him at his home; and, consequently, it is not a question of invitation.

But, sir, we have a more definite statement; and it is now no longer a question of doubt whether this is to be a Treasury charge or not, if further legislation is inaugurated. An amendment is now offered by a friend of the measure, asking that the first draft which we shall indorse upon the Treasury, the first expenditure which we shall authorize, shall amount to the sum of $3,000,000; and furthermore, the mists gradually clearing away in the course of debate, we find that it is a sine qua non that this shall be an international exposition—it shall not be merely the utterance in act of the patriotic emotions of our own people; it is indispensable to that fireside celebration that people of other nations shall be brought to surround the family hearth. It may have been a question heretofore if the promoters of the scheme would not consent to eliminate this incongruous feature; now that hope is disappointed, and we must fight them all along the line.

Two things are therefore developed by the debate, and both of them of infinite use in this discussion: first, that it is a financial proposition, involving the Treasury; and, secondly, that the most expensive form of exhibition is insisted upon.

Now, sir, to a centennial celebration, thus conducted, there are five prominent objections; and I intend, as briefly as I can, to call the attention of the Senate to these objections, and ask Senators if either one of them is not sufficient in itself to cause us to pause, and if all together they have not such force that we ought to stop, and stop forever, in the path in which we are being led.

The first objection to an international celebration, involving the Treasury, is that there is no public call for it whatever. There is no general movement among the constituents of Senators. There has been very little response of State Legislatures. There have been few favorable indications from the press—none that I have been able to discover except local, the other indications being generally hostile.

Where is the evidence of movements among the constituents of Senators except those of an entirely local character, commencing and ending in a small area of country about Philadelphia, the circle perhaps taking in New Jersey and Delaware, but extending nowhere else? Where are the petitions coming up to us? We all of us receive letters from gentlemen who are in the pay of this commission, whose expenses, as I understand, are paid by the citizens of Philadelphia, and who cannot now better employ their time than by literary efforts in behalf of this exhibition, which, if it continues, continues their pay. But, aside from this, I appeal to any Senator to tell me where there has been any indication of movement on the part of his constituents which would justify him in saying that there is a popular demand that millions be taken from the Treasury of the United States for this purpose? I have no reply, because there have been no such indications.

And what has been the response of the Legislatures? If any, few and far between. The subscriptions made by Legislatures have been confined to a single instance; it is possible there are two. The Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] whose graceful eloquence and fine qualities of mind are only exceeded by his generosity and kindness of heart, and to whom I listened with great pleasure yesterday—although not agreeing with much that he said—on account of the kindliness which pervaded his whole speech, and the eloquence which characterized it, touched upon the fact that his own State, his own patriotic State, rich with revolutionary memories, containing within its borders some of the battle-fields of the early Republic, had responded to this call, had shown its patriotism by a donation of, how much?

Mr. STOCKTON. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly; $100,000! New Jersey, in close proximity to the place where the celebration is to be had, feeling most strongly its influence, more strongly, perhaps, than any other State except Pennsylvania, and fifth in wealth and resources of the States of the Union, under these glowing emotions, and with these great resources, donates the munificent sum of $100,000!

Mr. STOCKTON. Will the Senator from California allow me a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. With pleasure.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to state a thing that I forgot to mention yesterday, but am reminded of now, that the name of Sargent is one of the proudest recollections of New Jersey.

Mr. SARGENT. I was endeavoring to do full justice to the State of New Jersey for its patriotism, its grand history, and the magnificent donation which it has made on this occasion. [A laugh.] But, Mr. President, if the donations of other States shall decrease inversely according to the ratio of distance, how much may we expect when we get to Illinois, how much when we get to Iowa? If their donations shall decrease according to their material wealth in comparison with New Jersey, where are the funds to come from except from the Treasury of the United States to sustain this costly international celebration?

But, sir, another indication of public sentiment, an unfailing one, sometimes unjust, sometimes cruel, nevertheless a means by which the average opinion of the people of the United States can be more rapidly and clearly gathered than by other instrumentality, is that of the press; and I say after some care to examine the question, that with the exception of the local press immediately concerned in this undertaking, there is no countenance or support on the part of the press in any part of the Union. If there is any it is entirely exceptional, and I shall be very glad if any Senator will show me the exception. This matter has fallen flat so far as the press is concerned. I have examined papers from all portions of the country in order to find if there were such evidences of public feeling and appreciation in this direction that it would be safe to trust a reasonable, I might say the liberal donation of $3,000,000 from the United States Treasury, expecting other communities to make up the amount, and I have failed to find the evidence that it would be safe. I find the Boston News and the Boston Herald, representative papers of that city—the others I have not had an opportunity to see—objecting to it; the Boston Herald speaking of it as "the Philadelphia scheme," and saying it is "ill-advised." The Washington Chronicle of this morning quotes some other papers to fortify its opinion to the same effect. The New York Tribune, certainly a leading representative paper of the ideas of a very large and powerful class in that city, has a column article going to show the absurdity of the form of celebration, and the folly of burdening the Treasury with such expenditures. I hold here the New York Evening Post. Does anybody impeach the standing of the New York Evening Post in matters of character, where questions of intellect, where questions of higher expediency, to put it as low as that, are concerned? Where the New York Evening Post is sure of its premises its reasoning is always just. Now I wish to call attention to the editorial of this leading paper of New York, and I ask gentlemen, as did the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] when this question was up several years ago, what can you expect in the way of success of your exhibition provided New York looks coldly upon it? Will you tell me that when the New York Tribune and the New York Evening Post not only look coldly upon it but denounce it, and when the New York World, that great organ of the democracy, which never falters in its leadership of that party, says that "this centennial business is absurd, and the quicker we get well rid of it the better"—will you tell me that you expect that when New York City, with its vast wealth, with its great commercial influence, with the necessity for it to help this thing along if it can be induced to do so, turns its back upon it and says it is absurd, and that the Treasury ought not to be burdened with it, then the thing can succeed? Let us see what the New York Evening Post says:

But why has the Philadelphia scheme failed, if, as seems now to be pretty generally conceded, it has failed? We think we are discharging a plain and pressing, though by no means pleasing, duty in suggesting three sufficient, though perhaps not the only, reasons:

First. In their haste, compounded not exclusively of patriotism, to forestall conflicting action in other quarters, the Philadelphians somewhat precipitately took the subject out of the hands of the nation and undertook an imperial enterprise with only municipal, or, at best, provincial resources.

Though conscious from the beginning of this disproportion between their means and their pretensions, they did not hesitate to purchase a charter from Congress, with a pledge that the nation should not be holden for any expenses to be incurred under it. This was all wrong. These gentlemen should not have allowed even their patriotism to hurry them headlong into an enterprise so entirely beyond their strength. Icarus was neither the first nor the last to teach that disaster and humiliation are the most certain fruits of presumption.

It was the duty of the President in good season to have named a special committee to devise and submit to him a plan for celebrating the centennial. By the light thus furnished he should have submitted the outlines, at least, of a plan to Congress for its approval and the requisite legislation. Out of the deliberations of such a commission, and those of Congress, the best methods of conducting such a celebration, the amount which might be prudently appropriated to it, and the restrictions most essential to prevent abuses in its management, would have been developed, so that when the plan began to take shape the national enthusiasm would have kept abreast, if not ahead, of it. The Philadelphians, unfortunately, in their indecorous eagerness to make themselves masters of the situation, overlooked the fact that this was a national, not a municipal, festival; a solemn fête, and not a financial speculation.

Secondly. This inconsiderate haste in appropriating to themselves a work which belonged to the nation bore its natural fruit. A plan was adopted which was not only ill-considered, but, in some of its main features, absurd. Having to show what a century of republicanism has accomplished for us, they propose to invite other nations to contrast with our work, what they have accomplished since the commencement of the Christian era, under forms of government based upon the most antagonistic principles. It is difficult to say whether such an invitation would be more deplorable as a specimen of breeding or of policy. With what face can President Grant ask the sovereigns of Europe to unite with him in celebrating an anniversary which organized rebellion and revolution as legitimate resources of statesmanship? Imagine the Queen of England sending a committee of her nobility to the United States in 1876 to glorify the event which stripped her kingdom of its finest colonies and sent her grandfather to bedlam; or Mexico, asking Spain to celebrate with her the establishment of the first Hispano-American republic; or the Emperor Wilhelm inviting President MacMahon to meet him at Strasburg to rejoice with those who rejoice over the anniversary of the peace of Versailles of 1871. And with what propriety can we ask continental sovereigns, whose most formidable enemies to-day are the republican enemies of their own household, to join us in commending our example to their people?

It is this illogical and absurd feature of the Philadelphia scheme which, luckily, makes it so expensive as to render it abortive. If our neighbors had contented themselves, as they should have done, with the most effective exposition possible of the best fruits of our fathers' great experiment in 1776, they need not have been beholden to any outside organization for aid, unless it came spontaneously. Neither the buildings nor running expenses of such a display need have been onerous to the State of Pennsylvania, and the results would have given to her the relative prominence among the States in 1876 that she held among the colonies in 1776. More than that she need not ask.

The third mistake made by the Philadelphia commission is, perhaps, less fundamental than either of the others, but in its effect upon the enthusiasm of the country at large has been equally fatal. We refer to the indirect ways taken by its members to entrap Congress into some legislation that should finally compel it to father their illegitimate offspring.

When the Philadelphians found that their eyes were bigger than their stomachs; that they had won an elephant which they could neither stall nor feed, they should have gone frankly to Congress and said—

Now observe, Senators, this is the language of one of the leading papers of the country, not my own; and I could show by papers that I have before me that this language is not exceptional. They talk as they are likely to talk hereafter. They talk as they are likely to talk when we take millions from the Treasury. If the language is not always parliamentary, if it is a little more harsh than that we are accustomed to use on this floor ourselves, it at any rate is instructive, and shows what the people think of this plan. It proceeds to state that the Philadelphians should have said to Congress—

"We have not the ability to execute our plan without aid from some source of from eight to ten million dollars. Give us that money and let us execute our plan, or execute it yourself. If you will not do that, make a plan of your own, and we will restrict our efforts to a municipal celebration." That would have thrown the responsibility for a suitable commemoration of our national birthday upon the President and Congress, where it belongs, and would have sheltered the Philadelphians from those suspicions which a want of directness in public as well as private matters always begets.

The Philadelphia commissioners are not likely to take this course until too late, both for them and for the centennial. Meantime, what is to be done? That is a question that can no longer be prudently postponed. It is clear that the Philadelphia scheme, pure and simple, from one cause or another, entirely fails to respond to the national feeling on this subject. The centennial will be celebrated even if the President and Congress take that day to go a-fishing. Such an anniversary will celebrate itself. The question is, whether we will make the most or take the risk of making the least of this notable epoch. If we would make the most of it, let the President do at once as any other government but ours, in contemplation of such an occasion, would have done two years ago—invite a half-dozen representative men to submit to him a plan for a celebration, taking what has been done in Philadelphia into their consideration, and with the aid of their counsel let him submit a plan of his own to Congress for its approval, and for such legislation as may be needed to carry it into effect. It would have been better if the President had taken this course earlier, but there is ample time yet, and, besides, there is no other alternative left that is better. The result of such a course of proceeding would have a national rather than a local character, it would reflect national rather than provincial feelings, and, let us hope, would arouse the patriotic rather than the mercenary impulses of the nation.

This extract is long, and I will not read others from other papers which I have before me from the South and West. The remark which I made is fully justified that that method by which we feel the pulse of the nation upon any great question being consulted now shows that there is no public demand for the legislation which was forced upon us. On the contrary, there is condemnation, suspicion, and repulsion.

The second objection to this legislation is on the score of economy. Admit that there is constitutional power, is this legislation expedient? I am willing that my democratic friends shall differ upon that or any other constitutional question among themselves; and it would be unfair to suggest that nearness or remoteness of locality has something to do with shades of difference in Senator's minds upon that question. I am not troubled on that question. I worked earnestly and voted for an appropriation for the expedition to the North Pole, to the Arctic regions; I believed it fell within our constitutional power to promote commerce. I have voted for the embellishment of this Capitol, even for the superfluities and luxuries in the way of pictures and statues, comparatively inexpensive, because I thought there was warrant for it in the Constitution. I have no difficulty in finding authority in the Constitution for any appropriate celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence. But there is another question: is it expedient? We may appropriate $50,000 to send a vessel into the polar regions, and not thereby commit ourselves to appropriate one hundred times that amount for some other purpose for which we may have equal constitutional warrant. I believe the purse was placed in the hands of Congress, and our discretion is large in these matters. Nevertheless, I think that every dollar that goes out of the Treasury of the United States should leave its friction upon our fingers as it slips out; and by no other means can we discharge our duties as legislators. That does not mean parsimony; it simply means conscientiousness. Did the people mean anything when they asked us for economy? Did the people mean anything when their cry compelled the last two national conventions of the parties to incorporate in their platforms an especial plank in favor of economical administration of the Government? When we promised economy to reach these seats, did we mean anything by it, or was it a mere empty form of words, the mere painting of the rainbow, a deception to the people without substance? If it meant anything, can that economy be in any better way illustrated than by scrutinizing carefully and jealously, ay, by refusing to pass a scheme by which the Treasury is to be depleted of untold millions? Sir, there are pressing wants of the people. There is a want of cheap transportation; and if we wish to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the United States, why not realize that plan outlined in the message of the President of the United States, by which the Father of Waters shall be connected with the Atlantic Ocean? Let it stand as a monument to all the States, and as a great memorial work useful to all time, while relieving the present and the future of those enormous costs of transportation which the Senator from Minnesota this morning spoke of, so that the abundant harvests of the West may be brought to the famishing regions of the East and Europe at less rates than it is possible for railroads to transport bulky products.

The President, in his last annual message, says:

> The State of New York has a canal connecting Lake Erie with tide-water on the Hudson River; the State of Illinois has a similar work connecting Lake Michigan with navigable water on the Illinois River, thus making water communication inland between the East and the West and South. These great artificial watercourses are the property of the States through which they pass, and pay toll to those States. Would it not be wise statesmanship to pledge these States that, if they will open these canals for the passage of large vessels, the General Government will look after and keep in navigable condition the great public highways with which they connect, to wit, the overslaugh on the Hudson, the Saint Clair Flats, and the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers? This would be a national work; one of great value to the producers of the West and South in giving them cheap transportation for their produce to the sea-board and a market; and to the consumers in the East in giving them cheaper food, particularly of those articles of food which do not find a foreign market, and the prices of which, therefore, are not regulated by foreign demands. The advantages of such a work are too obvious for argument. I submit the subject to you, therefore, without further comment.

Now, sir, if we want a centennial commemoration, let us inaugurate a work like that. Let us inaugurate it in the name of and to glorify the one hundredth anniversary of national independence.

But if that is too practical, if that is not fanciful enough, if that does not involve enough poetry, if it does not give opportunity for gentlemen to display their eloquence upon, let us build a monumental pillar, as Jacob set one up at Hebron, that shall be five hundred feet high, and on its broad base let it stand during that limit of eternity which time will permit, to show to the people a hundred years hence that this pillar was set up by their fathers in testimony of their appreciation of the privileges which had been wrought out by their fathers a hundred years before its erection. Instead of a little ripple upon the surface of business in that single locality, which five months or five years after the time shall have passed will have been forgotten, unless there may have been some scandal about it which may have been remembered, let us have some permanent work, something which will illustrate either the usefulness of the Government to the people, or else the taste and science and art of the people; an embellishment to transmit to the future.

I say, however, that this is forgetting something of the economy recommended in the President's message, to which I referred. The President of the United States called attention to the condition of the Treasury, and well he might, following such a panic; and he recommends suspension of work upon public buildings—the buildings at Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and Philadelphia, where the Government is suffering for the accommodation which those buildings would furnish; and he recommends, further, a suspension of the river and harbor improvements, because economy compels it; and even our fortifications, the wall that we build between ourselves and the aggression of any foreign foe. Economy requires, says the President of the United States, that we should suspend these things or cut them down to the very least amount possible; and I ask you, fellow-Senators, if the argument does not come with all the more force when it is not for works of public utility or works of public defense, but simply for a transient display to dazzle the eyes of other people?

But there is another and third objection. We cannot tell what this scheme will cost. There is no man prophet enough to tell to-day how much we shall expend out of the Treasury on this account during the next five years. My friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] wants this bill so perfected that the United States shall be entitled to receive, and shall receive, when there is a distribution of the profits and of the final proceeds, its ratable proportion of these proceeds. Has my friend attended to any of the discussions upon this matter; or did that portion of it arrest his attention where it was shown that in the Vienna exposition, after the whole amount paid upon it was expended, and all the proceeds of it had gone, and everything realized from the sale of the buildings and accessories, that there is a deficit of thirteen million florins—six or seven million dollars?

Mr. BAYARD. May not that have been because the Vienna exposition was not a success? I have heard men speak of the Vienna exhibition rather as a failure, and many reasons were given for it. There can be no doubt that the part the United States played in that exposition was quite unworthy of the capacity of our people. Nor do I understand, Mr. President, that it ought to be any objection, in perfecting the bill in the manner to which the Senator from California has alluded by securing to the United States their proper proportion, based upon the amount which the public Treasury shall have contributed, of the proceeds of any portion of the property which may enter into the construction of these buildings. If there be a profit, they will have their share of that; but if there be no profit, but simply a sum short of what was originally appropriated to be returned, they are still to have their share of that; and if there is to be loss, as occurred in the case of the Vienna exposition, and which I do not think can be fairly predicated, still the more necessity for that reason in having a return made to our Treasury of the proportionate amount we shall have expended toward the completion of the enterprise.

Mr. SARGENT. It might be well perhaps to enact in legislation that the smoke from consumed cigars should be collected for public use. There is no harm in providing that the United States shall have its share of the profits of this institution. I was not criticising that; I was simply criticising the absurdity of the idea that there would be any return to the Treasury of the United States. The Senator says that he understands Vienna was a failure. Why? It was under the auspices and the direct control of a powerful and wealthy government, and there were the Turks and the Algerines and the Chinese, and the people from Nubia and Egypt, and Greece and Persia, which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] insisted would give success to an institution of this sort, and said we must have here at our exhibition in order to make money out of the affair. They were all there at Vienna. Their quaint costumes variegated the streets of that city and shone through the areas of the exhibition. There was the pig-tail from China, there was the flowing robe from Persia, there were the uncouth costumes of all lands, there was barbarous and civilized art there, there was everything, so far as display is concerned, which could be hoped for in an exhibition; and yet it failed. The Senator says that our exhibition there was not creditable to us. I know that it cost the United States Treasury a good deal of money for that which we did exhibit there; but the reason it was not more successful, so far as the United States were concerned, was the very reason that will make this a failure in Pennsylvania—that there were three thousand miles of water to be crossed, that transportation was expensive, that private enterprise cannot overcome such obstacles. It is because there is no necessary connection between our people and those of distant countries, and great difficulty of intercourse.

Mr. SCOTT rose.

Mr. SARGENT. I will yield in a moment.

They are a world unto themselves, not only in their institutions but in their business, as we are to ourselves; and it is this broad-rolling ocean, this difficulty of communication, which would prevent these elements of success being available to us which they had at Vienna. There they had everything at their command, situated in the midst of two hundred and fifty millions of population against forty millions of our own, and it was a failure.

I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Would it at all interrupt the chain of the Senator's argument if I were to suggest to him that there was one thing which interfered with the success of the Vienna exhibition which he has omitted in his enumeration of what was present, and that was, for a short time, the cholera, and the apprehension for a considerable time that it would be a great deal worse?

Mr. SARGENT. Admitting, Mr. President, that the cholera may have deterred one-fourth of the people who otherwise might have been available for such an exposition, two hundred and fifty millions of people were more accessible to Vienna than forty millions are to Philadelphia. Now, deduct one-fourth, and still the proportion is vastly against you, and the argument fails. But I was going to say further, that it was not on account of the paucity of our exhibition there that the Vienna exhibition failed, as my friend from Delaware would seem to imply. If we had not gone there at all it would still have been a failure; and if we had gone to five or twenty times the amount we did, the failure would still have been. I have a letter, (which I have drawn out by my own request from the Secretary of State,) from Mr. Jay, our minister at Vienna, which was dated in January last, speaking of the finances of the exhibition there, in which he says:

AMERICAN LEGATION, VIENNA, January 30, 1874.

SIR: It may be of interest to the centennial commission and to Congress, should the subject again occupy their attention, to know from an official source the cost of the Vienna exposition, and the extent to which it paid for itself; and as in a former dispatch, No. 653, of November 4, I said I thought that the deficit would exceed one-half of the cost, I now beg leave to say that the cost, as I am advised by the minister of finance, has amounted to twenty millions of florins, and the loss to two-thirds of that amount. The deficit is larger than was expected, and the addition of some thirteen millions of florins to the year's budget is by no means convenient. * * * * * * *

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN JAY.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

And, sir, when we meet here in December, 1876, with a big deficit on this account, it will be by no means convenient, especially if we find another panic on our hands; and who could have foreseen the panic of last September six months before? Who could have seen it two years before?

Sir, I plead on behalf of economy against this outlay. The people of this nation this year are taxed $300,000,000. Do Senators realize that amount? I know we have passed through a war where by a single bill we appropriated $500,000,000, and we became accustomed to vast amounts; but now we have reverted to a state of peace; the country has got back to a normal condition; and although of this great amount $157,000,000 are for causes springing directly out of that war, and therefore sanctioned by patriotic considerations, nevertheless the burden is none the less great; nevertheless there is no less the obligation upon us not to add to that $300,000,000 which we annually draw from the pockets of our people.

Sir, I object, I say, because I do not know how much this thing will cost. If we begin, can we stop? Are we able to stop now? That is the question which presents itself to the American Senate: "Are we able to stop now?" Can we stand up against the solicitation of our brother Senators whom we hold in high esteem? Can we stand up against the official solicitations of those whom we have named from our States, who write to us, or come here, and beg of us not to stop? Can we stop, although we put in all former legislation pledges which disarmed public criticism; pledges which disarmed criticism in Congress; pledges that this should not cost the Treasury a dollar? Can we stop now notwithstanding that? If we cannot stop now, can we stop after we have put $3,000,000 upon this inclined plane? Can we stop when afterward a deficit is brought to us of $7,000,000 more or $10,000,000 more?

We do not know what this may cost, because we do not know that we shall get any money from any other source. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] the other day, pledged his State to do certain things; to repeal the law to whose features I called attention; and to make an appropriation directly out of her treasury. I admit that that has been done, to a certain extent, by one house—the senate—of the State of Pennsylvania; but that is clogged by legislation which if we put into our bill this exhibition will never realize a dollar from any appropriation we may make. The Senator from Delaware said that on account of the panic it was almost impossible to get subscriptions for any purpose whatever; and yet the Legislature of Pennsylvania makes it a condition of its appropriation of $1,000,000 that there shall be a million of bona fide subscriptions on the part of citizens of Philadelphia. My authority is the Philadelphia North American and United States Gazette, certainly friendly to the cause, for I find in looking it over that its talented and amiable correspondent plays the part of claqueur to those gentlemen who are in favor of this bill, praises its friends, and slightingly speaks of all who oppose it, misrepresents their motives, decries their judgment, and implies that they are governed by the most sordid considerations. So I think the paper itself must be good authority on that side of the question; and according to it the Legislature hampers its legislation with these conditions of which I speak. If the Senator from Delaware is correct, that it is impossible to get private subscriptions, then this $1,000,000 never will be realized; and, furthermore, I cannot find by reading over the Philadelphia papers that they have taken out the provision that this shall go to build a local, perpetual memorial building. They do not, as was pledged, throw this sum into the assets of the concern. But I do not desire to repeat the argument which I made the other day on that point. I simply state that the amended legislation does not come up to that which was promised. If I am correct in this, then the Treasury of the United States is the only resource. We are not now merely auxiliaries, we are not now merely helping the matter along, but we are taking it under our auspices, in the phrase of the bill, and we are paying the whole expense.

I do not wish to speak unkindly of Philadelphia or Pennsylvania. I simply speak of the managers of this concern, and not of them unkindly, but simply desire to speak truthfully, and I say they come to us in the attitude of a stranger who steps up to another and says, "Please give me a light," and the other feels in his pocket and after some difficulty pulls out a match and hands it to him. "This match is of no use to me without a cigar," and then he wants a cigar. [A laugh.] That is the way they come to us. They want us to do it all. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] suggests to me that they want a box of cigars. I think so.

The fourth objection to this plan is that it is international; and its friends still, and to the very last moment, insist upon this feature of it. In his reference to the Turks and Algerines and Chinese, &c., the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] said that this was absolutely necessary in order that this might be a pecuniary success. The same ground was taken by the other Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] who addressed us yesterday, insisting upon this feature. Allow me to suggest that this is most incongruous. It is incongruous for us to invite those dynasties which are founded upon divine right to come here on such an occasion to help us celebrate such an event as that which, in the language of our forefathers, overthrew forever the divine right of kings, as that which established the truth of the inalienable sovereignty of the people. We ask them to help us celebrate our repudiation and that of our fathers of all their claims to their kingly power, and all their claims to all authority of any kind which they exercise over their people. England and the nations of the earth, on some other occasion, when these memories would not be aroused, when it was not for the very purpose of recalling the events of the past which taught and enforced these doctrines, might come and visit us because they recognize us as in the family of nations. On such an occasion, as the New York Post well says, it is an insult to them to suppose that they will do that. There is no sympathy in behalf of republicanism on the part of any ruler in Europe. Switzerland may have maintained a republic for ages; but it has been because her mountain-peaks, her avalanches, her difficult passes, her rigorous seasons, have enabled her to hurl down invaders as she did Charles of Burgundy, Charles the Bold, who, after his third defeat, was found dead, with his head frozen in the morass of Nancy. The moral and political atmosphere of Europe has asphyxiated three French republics—made it impossible for them to maintain themselves there. The republic of Spain is now struggling against a military power and greater resources than could be wielded by any one man unless he had secret assistance from the cabinets of Europe. How was it during our own rebellion? How ready was the English premier, although an ordinarily intelligent statesman—a liberal statesman according to English politics—how ready was he to declare that we were fallen, fallen, fallen! How prompt was he to say that the North fought only for power and not for principle, and to recognize the belligerency of our adversaries! How ready to wink at the launching of pirate ships upon our commerce, and how sullenly was reparation made therefor! Sympathy for republican institutions! How eagerly the French Empire seized upon the moment to grasp Mexico, and erect there another empire, trusting in our weakness! No, sir; they rushed to exult in our downfall, and take advantage of our misfortunes. There is no sympathy for republican institutions in Europe. If they came here on such an occasion and kept decorous countenances, it would be the decorum of hypocrisy. We must smother our words before them and cease to exult; be un-American in our utterances on that great occasion, or else we must insult their prejudices, the very deepest in their nature. Ask Europe to come at any other time and it may do so, but it can have no cheerful participation in such a glorification. You might as well invite the college of cardinals, and the Catholic powers to celebrate the birth of Luther and his inauguration of the Reformation by nailing his theses to the gates of Nuremberg. You might as well ask the Protestant powers to celebrate the anniversary of the eve of Saint Bartholomew or the extirpation of the Waldenses. You might as well ask the people of Ireland to join in glorifying the battle of the Boyne, or attend an Orange demonstration. As well invite the people of France to celebrate the unity of Germany and the annexation of Alsace and Lorraine. Why not? Because it is incongruous; because there is something revolting either to the prejudice or the principles of those whom you thus invite. And will you tell me that there is nothing revolting to the prejudices or principles of monarchical powers when you ask them to come and hear us glorify the birth of the nation which vindicates the right of individual liberty, of popular sovereignty, the inherent right in the man himself to organize governments in such form as to him seemed best, and sweep away the divine right, the traditions of the hoary past, the feudal maxims and customs that have oppressed peoples? Why, sir, there is just as direct antagonism between these ideas as there is between light and darkness; and this gives the incongruity to this idea. I admit that those who are referred to as the ornaments of this occasion, and as necessary to give it a money-making character, by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] the Persians, and the Chinese, and the Nubians, and the Mongolians, and the Sandwich Islanders, have no very particular ideas or deep prejudice on this matter. But we do invite those who are exemplars in their own person, and by the possession of their power, of exactly the opposite ideas to those we intend to celebrate. We invite them where they will not come.

The fifth consideration why this legislation should not take place is that there is something ominous in the result of similar exhibitions heretofore. My friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] briefly adverted to this consideration the other day, but did not elaborate it as fully as I hoped he might do, for it seemed to me that there was very much in the thought.

The first grand national exhibition was that of England. It was designed to inculcate the doctrine of "on earth peace, good will toward men." It was intended to assemble the nations there to a grand peace jubilee to celebrate the very highest principles of humanity, of national justice, and universal good will. Within three years thereafter England was involved in the bloody Crimean war, and principally on account of that exhibition. Philosophic historians say that England so disguised its character that neighboring rulers, notably he of Russia, supposed that England was in a decline; that it had lost its warlike spirit; that it was no longer able or willing to contend in the conflicts of arms, and hence he might partition Turkey, seize upon the property of the "sick man in the south," and England would not resist. I know that this is somewhat an extraordinary statement, but I am prepared to show by authority that the exhibition given by England at that time, with the avowed purpose of perpetuating "on earth peace, good will toward men," involved her in bloody war. I hold in my hand Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea—the author one of the most philosophical historians that I ever read, and the most careful—and he has a portion of a chapter upon this very idea; and I invite the attention of the Senate to it:

England had long been an enigma to the political students of the Continent, but after the summer of 1851 they began to imagine that they really at last understood her. They thought that she was falling from her place among nations; and indeed there were signs which might well lead a shallow observer to fancy that her ancient spirit was failing her. An army is but the limb of a nation, and it is no more given to a people to combine the possession of military strength with an unmeasured devotion to the arts of peace, than it is for a man to be feeble and helpless in the general condition of his body, and yet to have at his command a strong right arm for the convenience of self-defense. The strength of the right arm is as the strength of the man; the prowess of an army is as the valor and warlike spirit of the nation which gives it her flesh and blood. England, having suffered herself to grow forgetful of this truth, seemed, in the eyes of foreigners, to be declining. It was not the reduction of the military establishment which was the really evil sign; for, to say nothing of ancient times, the Swiss in Europe, and some of the States of the North American continent, have shown the world that a people which almost dispenses with a standing army may yet be among the most resolute and warlike of nations; but there was in England a general decrying of arms. Well-meaning men harangued and lectured in this spirit. What they sincerely desired was a continuance of peace; but instead of taking the thought and acquiring the knowledge which might have qualified them to warn their fellow-countrymen against steps tending to a needless war, they squandered their indignation upon the deceased authors of former wars, and used language of such breadth that what they said was as applicable to one war as to another. At length they generated a sect called the "peace party," which denounced war in strong, indiscriminate terms.

Moreover, at this time extravagant veneration was avowed for mechanical contrivances, and the very words which grateful nations had wrought from out of their hearts in praise of tried chiefs and heroes, were plundered, as it were, from the warlike professions, and given to those who for their own gain could make the best goods. It was no longer enough to say that an honest tradesman was a valuable member of society, or that a man who contrived a good machine was ingenious. More was expected from those who had the utterance of the public feeling; and it was announced that "glory" and "honor"—nay, to prevent all mistakes, "true honor" and "true glory"—were due to him who could produce the best articles of trade. At length, in the summer of 1851, it was made to appear to foreigners that this singular faith had demanded and obtained an outward sign of its acceptance, and a solemn recognition by church and state. The foreigners were mistaken. The truth is, that the English, in their exuberant strength and their carelessness about the strict import of words, are accustomed to indulge a certain extravagance in their demonstrations of public feeling; and this is the more bewildering to foreign minds because it goes along with practical moderation and wisdom. What the English really meant was to give people an opportunity of seeing the new inventions and comparing all kinds of patterns; but, above all, to have a new kind of show, and bring about an immense gathering of people. Perhaps, too, in the secret hearts of many who were weary of tame life, there lurked a hope of animating tumults. This was all the English really meant. But the political philosophers of the Continent were resolved to impute to the islanders a more profound intent. They saw in the festival a solemn renouncing of all such dominion as rests upon force. England, they thought, was closing her great career by a whimsical act of abdication; and it must be acknowledged that there was enough to confound men accustomed to lay stress upon symbols. For the glory of mechanic arts, and in token of their conquest over nature, a cathedral of glass climbed high over the stately elms of Knight'sbridge, inclosing them, as it were, in a casket the work of men's hands, and it was not thought wrong nor impious to give the work the sanction of a religious ceremony. It was by the archbishop of Canterbury that the money-changers were brought back into the temple. Few protested. One man, indeed, abounding in scriptures, and influenced with the sight of the glass Babel ascending to the skies, stood up and denounced the work, and foretold "wars" and "judgments." But he was a prophet speaking to the wrong generation, and no one heeded him. Indeed, it seemed likely that the soundness of his mind would be questioned; and if he went on to foretell that within three years England would be engaged in a bloody war springing out of a dispute about a key and a silver star, he was probably adjudged to be mad, for the whole country at the time felt sure of its peaceful temper. Certainly it was a hard task for the sagacity of a foreigner to pierce through these outward signs, and see that, notwithstanding them all, the old familiar "eastern question" might be so used as to make it rekindle the warlike ardor of England. Even for Englishmen, until long after the beginning of 1853, it was difficult to foresee how the country would be willing to act in regard to the defense of Turkey, and the representatives of foreign powers accredited to Saint James's might be excused if they assured their courts that England was deep in pursuits which would hinder her from all due assertion of her will as a great European power. Thus foreigners came to believe that the English nature was changed, and that for the future the country would always be tame in Europe.

Tracing by this very course of reasoning the act of the English in their apparent abdication of warlike ideas, in their glorification of the mechanical arts exclusively, in their great parade of their devotion to "peace on earth and good will to men" as an indication that England would not be in the way in case there were aggressive movements on the part of Russia, the Emperor Nicholas presumed on the acquiescence of the British lion, and the Crimea became the scene of one of the most terrific conflicts which the world has ever seen.

Mr. SCOTT. It was the mistake of the Czar that brought on the war, and not the exhibition.

Mr. SARGENT. The mistake of the Czar arose from these acts of England. The exhibition was the occasion of the mistake of the Czar, and therefore the direct cause of the Crimean war.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator. It was an entirely friendly suggestion that the Czar was mistaken in reading the signs of the millennium, and that it was not the millennium itself that brought on the war.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator does not disturb me by his suggestions. I very willingly yield to them. I seek only the truth in this debate. Let me give him another illustration.

There was the French exposition. Let us see who was mistaken there. I read the other day a dispatch from the French minister of foreign affairs glorifying his serene highness Prince Napoleon, who with other notable and royal persons was put in charge of that exposition, an exposition gotten up not for peace on earth and good will to men, but to glorify the Napoleonic family; to seat that dynasty strongly in the hearts of the French people; to show how great and magnificent in peace was the genius of this Napoleonic family; and they had there an assemblage and guests from all parts of the earth, and it seemed as if there was a high wave of prosperity sweeping over France. But what was the result? Peculation, corruption, infidelity in every branch of the government, stimulated by this means, stimulated by these vast expenditures. There was the pride of the dynasty itself stimulated by the spectacle which it was making of itself to all the nations of the earth, and the lip-worship which was pronounced at their family altar by other sovereigns who came there then, some of them for the first time recognizing Napoleon as a brother sovereign. It passed by, but the effect of it was felt until that dynasty was overthrown. Was it any wonder, with the corruption caused by such lavish expenditure of money, by the luxury introduced by such lavish hospitality, that subsequently when it came to a war which, if not provoked by France, she was at any rate ready to engage in, her arsenals were depleted of effective arms, and her shells when loaded in the gun to be discharged in the face of the enemy were found to be filled with black sawdust? Was it any wonder that with the pride of family thus stimulated they thought they could fight Germany or all Europe, and wore upon the shoulder perpetually a challenge for Germany or any other nation to engage in deadly conflict? The pride of the family under the stimulus of the exhibition became so great that it walked before their destruction and they fell. As in the case of England, here is more than a coincidence; there is natural cause and effect.

How was it in reference to the Vienna exposition? They assembled all nations there; the citizens of Vienna went to work to erect enormous hotels, expecting a high flood-tide of riches to be swept in by the incoming current of visitors. Costly preparations of all kinds were made. The exhibition failed; and as signified by the finance minister of Austria, the enormous proportion of three-fourths of the amount expended is an actual loss. A financial embarrassment was brought on the people of the city—bankruptcy instead of prosperity. What the result may be, we cannot tell yet. It takes two or three years for these things to work themselves out. Nobody could have predicted when the hammer of Prince Albert came down, at the close of the English exhibition, that, three short years after, the peace so much glorified and sought to be illustrated by that exhibition, would be broken, and England be involved in a lengthy and bloody war. Nobody could tell at the immediate close of the French exposition that the dynasty which had shown its own glory would be evanescent as a dream; that in a few short years it would pass away, and by the very causes which took root in that exhibition. And now nobody can tell what may be the result of this deficiency of millions in which the Austrian government is involved, and what may be the result upon its people of the failures, the embarrassments, and bankruptcies which have been occasioned by it. With a strong hereditary dynasty, and a people little given to questioning the acts of their rulers, the utmost result may be financial distress. But who shall not predict even this?

The results of these exhibitions have always been fatal. To what will this exhibition here be fatal? It will be fatal to the republican party! I know my democratic friends are prepared to vote, most of them, against this measure. They, as wise party men, would certainly vote against it; because they can hold us republicans, who have a majority of over two-thirds here and over two-thirds in the other House, responsible for any failure which may come, as failure is inevitable. They know that in the next presidential election this is an effective weapon, that can be brought against us. I do not wonder that the democrats should speak and act against this measure. We are responsible, as the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] on a former occasion, well said; we are responsible for measures of this character. I do not mean responsible to our individual oaths merely, but responsible as party men, having the weight put upon us by public opinion for the measures which are sanctioned here, and for their failure or success. Now, sir, if this is a failure, as Vienna was a failure, with greater resources and better opportunities, it is a failure that comes in the very midst of our presidential election. If this is a failure, we get the full disadvantage of it at that moment. But, more than that, have we such confidence in those in whom we may invest the expenditure of millions of dollars that we believe all will be properly applied? The Legislature of Pennsylvania was not willing to trust our finance board with $50,000, unless it was shown that $50,000, before doled out to them, had been "properly applied," in the language of the statute. It would be a touching simplicity which would lead us to suppose that $3,000,000 or $10,000,000 of money will corrupt no one. We have no right to assume that some portion of this money will not be used for bad purposes. The Constitution of the United States hedges us about in every step which we may take, both Senators and Representatives, and it hedges about supreme and other judges. Wherever you turn in the Constitution of the United States you find that there are guards against the cupidity of men. Why? Because our fathers, wiser than this legislation would seem to indicate us to be, recognized the fact that there was in the average man a tendency toward evil. They provided, among other things with reference to Senators and Members of Congress, that no Senator or Member shall be appointed to any office which shall be created or the emoluments of which shall be increased during his term of service. Why? Because his experience would not be valuable in such office. Because, having served as a Senator of the United States, he would not be better than another to fill a lower position than that of Senator? No, sir; but because they would not hold the temptation to cupidity of any man to create these offices in order to occupy them. The same rule is applied to our judges, to remove from them temptation arising from the fear of their salaries being tampered with on account of any decision they might make which might meet with disfavor from Congress; recognizing the fact that men are open to pecuniary considerations, are open to corruption. By this they did not impeach the court; they did not impeach any individual, and neither do I by my remarks; but simply show that the fathers, wise in their day and generation, surrounded their legislators and their judges with guards which are not in the way of an honest man, but which deter a dishonest man from carrying out dishonesty.

If there be scandal in reference to this exhibition, we shall get the full effect of it in this presidential election that is to come. I am speaking to republicans now. I say that this measure will be fatal to the republican party, as these others have been fatal to dynasties; have involved bloody wars; have produced consequences evil for humanity. Any scandal in connection with this scheme will be worse for us than the Credit-Mobilier exposure; because it will be open to denunciation before the people during the most heated time, during the most inflamed period, of a presidential election. Suppose it is a failure; suppose there are few people who come there; we spend more than $3,000,000; suppose it runs to $10,000,000, the original cost of the Vienna exhibition, with a probable deficit—how, I ask, are republican Senators to stand up and explain these things to their constituents? Can we say to them, "We were memorialized by your Legislatures to take that step?" Their reply is, "Show us the memorials of our Legislatures. A few, locally interested or near by and influenced by immediate and direct sympathy, may have so said; but the Legislatures of the United States did not say so as a rule." Shall we say, "We were so invited by the press, and deceived?" On the contrary, they can show, as I have shown this morning—for I have tried to strip this thing bare and show its very skeleton—"The press warned you against it; the press said it was absurd; the leading papers said it was an abuse; they denounced it from day to day, and you ought to have paid attention to them." Shall we say, "We were petitioned by our constituents, who speak for themselves, and not through the press?" They will demand to know where the petitions are; and I say the petitions are not here. We are not thus petitioned. We can have no excuse. We shall have to meet the scandal; we shall have to meet the failure; and if it does not bear down the republican party, then I shall be most happy. But I fear that result.

Now, sir, I appeal on behalf of the Treasury of the United States. I appeal on behalf of this tax-ridden people, with its $300,000,000 of annual payment to meet the interest on the national debt and to keep the Treasury from bankruptcy; and I beg Senators, in view of all the considerations which have been urged against this bill, to carefully consider, before they determine that this scheme shall be resurrected and put upon its feet, and the life-blood which it shall receive be drawn exclusively from the Treasury of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] to the instructions proposed by his colleague, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

Mr. THURMAN. Let that be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of Mr. STOCKTON is to add to the instructions moved by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN the following:

> And with additional instruction to provide that the exhibition to be held in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence shall be international in its character, so as to exhibit the progress of the United States in the industries and arts beneficial to mankind, in comparison with those of older nations, as provided in the act of Congress approved March 2, 1871.

Mr. CONKLING. To what instructions is that an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The instructions moved by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> With instructions to report a bill making appropriation of a sufficient sum of money from the Treasury of the United States, not exceeding $3,000,000, toward defraying the expense of the centennial celebration and exhibition to be held under the auspices of the United States at the city of Philadelphia, in 1876, under such regulations as will secure the faithful application and expenditure of said appropriation.

Mr. THURMAN. As I understood it, my colleague moved to refer this bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And thereupon the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] moved to instruct the committee as just read, and then the Senator from New Jersey, his colleague, [Mr. STOCKTON,] moved to amend his instructions by adding what was first read.

Mr. THURMAN. The question, then, is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey nearest me, [Mr. STOCKTON?]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

The question being put, it was declared that the negative appeared to prevail, and a division was called for.

Mr. SCOTT. As the Senate is thin and evidently all Senators were not apprised that we were likely to reach a vote at this time, I wish for a few moments to correct one or two statements made by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] which I think would do injustice to other parties than those to whom they were directly applied.

In the first place, the Senator from California made the statement in the opening of his remarks that it was this debate which had developed the international character of this exhibition; at least he made that remark, that it had been developed by this debate.

Mr. SARGENT. That its friends had insisted upon it.

Mr. SCOTT. But the remark made was that the debate had developed two things: first, that this was a financial proposition; and, secondly, that it was proposed to make it an international exhibition.

Mr. SARGENT. That its friends had insisted upon that in spite of all we could do.

Mr. SCOTT. But the remark carried the implication that this was the first time that had been developed. Now, I am not about to repeat anything that I said in regard to the character of the original bill; but as the Senator was at the time that bill passed the House of Representatives a member of that House, I simply wish to do justice to the parties who had charge of the bill then by showing that not only in the bill but in the debate it was clearly announced that it was to be an international exhibition. On the 14th of December, 1870, the author of the bill, and the chairman of the committee who had it in charge, in speaking upon it, said this:

> If, then, there be a national celebration worthy of the occasion, there must be an exhibition of universal industries. It must be competitive to evoke and reward merit, elicit interest, and insure success. And as at the appropriate celebration of our most distinguished national fête we must expect the graceful recognition of friendly peoples, we can do no less than invite their attendance, and in doing this we cannot without churlishness refuse to give them the privilege of friendly competition for the rewards of excellence.
> To bring together the varied productions of our soil, our mines, and our workshops, the creations of our artists and the works of our authors and inventors, and place them side by side with the productions of other countries, would afford an opportunity for a comparison of the progress in the arts of civilization accomplished in a single century in this country with the best results of human effort in all ages in all the rest of the world. Such an exhibition would call together representatives from all parts of the globe, and familiarize our people with the choicest productions of other lands. It would bring among us the skilled artisans and men of talent and enterprise from every competing country, many of whom, after realizing the opportunities for improving their fortunes that are presented under our free institutions, would make their homes here and give us the benefit of their skill and experience. Others, who would return to their own people, would carry with them vivid impressions of the advantages of a republican Government and just conceptions of the capabilities of the American people. Looking exclusively to the advantages to be derived by our own citizens, it may be safely affirmed that they would be a thousand times repaid for all the expense of every character to which the Government, corporations, associations, and individuals would be subjected.

That is an extract from the remarks made by Hon. D. J. Morrell at that time.

On the same occasion Hon. LEONARD MYERS, a Representative from the city of Philadelphia, made these remarks:

> This mighty consummation must be honored not merely by a general thanksgiving, but it is admitted that under the national sanction there should be a national commemoration, an international exhibition, where not only the United States, but other lands shall bring together some of the results which this wonderful century has quickened into existence; where agriculture shall still assert the supremacy of the soil, and the mines pour out their wealth of ores; where commerce shall waft on new wings the gifts of the nations, and steam shall speed to us friendly thousands, and electricity bear their messages of good-will; where manufactures, the prohibition of which was a fruitful cause for the Colonies to rebel, shall contribute from their vast store-house of improvements, and from which it is hoped other lands may learn the lesson of unity and peace.

There were other remarks of a similar character made by this Representative from the city of Philadelphia which I do not take time to quote.

The Senator from California further, in speaking of the five causes that ought to operate against this exhibition, spoke of there being no popular response either by the people or by the press. So far as popular response is concerned, and the press also, I desire to say that the voice of the press at present, within the last few days, since the interest of localities has been enlisted in this procedure, is very different from what it was in the early part of the enterprise. From some of the very papers to which the Senator from California has referred

I could quote extracts of the most favorable character during the early part of the progress of this enterprise. Sir, if I am not misinformed, the boards of trade of two of the very cities to which he has referred were assembled, and to the representatives of the centennial board of finance they gave the most favorable and emphatic assurances that they would contribute the amount which was assessed upon those cities. If I mistake not, the Senator from Massachusetts himself could bear witness that when the Boston Board of Trade assembled they gave that assurance to the gentleman from Philadelphia who was present representing the centennial board of finance.

But, sir, the panic has intervened, and it now becomes a matter to consider, properly to consider, whether it is right, in view of the public finances, to make this appropriation; and in addition to that, there seems to have arisen a feeling of hostility to Philadelphia because this celebration is to be held there. I suppose it would have been the same if any other locality had been selected. We seem, somehow or other, to be so constituted—I was going to say, to quote the remark of a celebrated philosopher—"that we take some consolation, or some delight even, in the misfortunes of our best friends;" and if some other place had been selected, probably—I will not say certainly—Philadelphia might have manifested the same phase of human nature. Her citizens are called upon to take upon themselves the burden of this celebration as well as to realize any of the profits which may result from its locality. Certainly, to a few individuals there will be great inducements; it will be profitable; but to the gentlemen who have charge of the exhibition it is a labor and a burden for which they can have no other compensation than the satisfaction of having discharged a patriotic duty.

Sir, I was somewhat surprised that the Senator from California incorporated into his remarks, thereby to some extent indorsing, the editorial of the New York Post. It had attracted my attention, and its animus would certainly attract the attention of any one, coming at this particular date; and how far the animus of that article should be considered by an American public, I think will be made manifest by calling attention to one sentence in it; and I think those who recognize the Revolution as a milestone upon the highway of human progress will hardly be content to indorse the sentiment of this paper. Let me read it; let me emphasize it:

> With what face can President Grant ask the sovereigns of Europe to unite with him in celebrating an anniversary which organized rebellion and revolution as legitimate resources of statesmanship?

The Revolution not one of the legitimate resources of statesmanship—our Revolution—the Revolution of 1776!

Why, sir, where do you get your statesmanship? I understand the underlying principle of our institutions to be that no government has any just powers but those which are derived from the consent of the governed; and it was at the bottom of all political power that the Revolution started, man demanding that he should have the right of self-government, and that no power should be exercised over him without his own consent; and now a newspaper is quoted in the Senate of the United States to throw a sneer upon that Revolution as one of the legitimate resources of statesmanship. It might well be quoted in opposition to the centennial celebration of the Declaration of Independence, and I can hardly conceive of any other appropriate place to quote it. I know the Senator quoted it as a part of the voice of the press; but it shows the animus of that opposition.

One thing more. This same article speaks of the indirect way of doing this thing, and charges it upon Philadelphia:

> The third mistake made by the Philadelphia commission is perhaps less fundamental than either of the others, but in its effect upon the enthusiasm of the country at large has been equally fatal. We refer to the indirect ways taken by its members to entrap Congress into some legislation that should finally compel it to father their illegitimate offspring.

Mr. President, the first act was passed in 1871; and let me see who were named by the governors of the States. I will not read them all, but from California I find the names of John Dunbar Creigh and John Middleton; from Massachusetts I find the names of George B. Loring and William B. Spooner; from Kentucky those of Robert Mallory and Smith M. Hobbs; from Iowa, Robert Lowry and Coker F. Clarkson; from Ohio, Alfred T. Goshorn and Wilson W. Griffith, and so on; and I might proceed and name the gentlemen who compose the centennial commission. It was not Philadelphia that came and asked for the incorporation of the centennial board of finance, but it was this whole commission. Mr. Loring from Massachusetts, Mr. Lowry from Iowa, Mr. Goshorn from Ohio, Judge Creigh from California, these were the men who, sitting in Philadelphia in June, 1872, sent their dispatches to the Senate asking them to pass this act of incorporation, so that they might take action upon it before they adjourned. Philadelphia came here in no indirect way. This was the act of the nation through the commission appointed by the States; and when I say the "nation," I mean the acts of all the States in pursuance of a national appointment.

I did not rise for the purpose of going into any further extended debate. I want to vote, and I wish the Senate to declare decidedly and decisively now, first, whether this exhibition shall be international in its character; and, next, whether these men who made all the efforts they could to carry out this organization upon the plan which they adopted, and which Congress sanctioned, and who have failed in that, are to abandon their work as it stands at present and leave it to float on at chance, or whether they are to be encouraged and receive the sanction of Congress, and endeavor to make this celebration a joy and a credit to the American people.

Now, Mr. President, I trust I shall not be tempted to say another word on this subject.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to call his attention to a statute of 1851, of the Pennsylvania Legislature, which, as I am informed, is still in existence, which provides—

> That from and after the 1st day of May next—

Now, of course, long past—

> it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to sell within the city or county of Philadelphia by sample, card, or other specimen, any goods or merchandise of any kind or description whatsoever, for or on account of any merchant, manufacturer, or other person not having his principal place of business within this State, and to whom a license has not been granted under the laws of this Commonwealth; and if any person shall sell or exhibit for sale, either by sample, card, or otherwise, in the city or county of Philadelphia, any goods or merchandise in violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons so offending shall be liable to a fine of $300 for every such offense, which may be recovered by suit, &c.

In the next section I find that the cost of a license is $300. I wish to inquire if that legislation still exists in the city of Philadelphia, where the manufacturers of the United States are to be invited to show their goods? My impression is that it does.

Mr. SCOTT. That was in 1851. It is a local act applicable to Philadelphia alone; and if there is anything proverbial in Pennsylvania it is that no lawyer would answer any legal question about local legislation until he had looked through every volume of the acts of Assembly from that day down to the present. Whether it is in operation or not I cannot tell; but I can assure him if there be any statute upon the statute-books of Pennsylvania which can interfere with the success of this exhibition, or which might be considered even technically as in the light of this exhibition, there will be no difficulty whatever in repealing it long before it shall be found to be an obstruction in the way of the exhibition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I do not rise to prolong this discussion, but to make a suggestion or two. The Senator from Pennsylvania evidently seems to have thought, by his emphasis, that he was scoring at least one against the New York Evening Post, or against the Senator from California, by quoting what was said in relation to rebellion and revolutionary government. Now, it is very possible that here, in a republican Government, we should look with more favor upon a revolution, founded on republican principles, that was brought about by a rebellion than the people under governments that have kings or emperors over them by divine right; and I think that was all that the editor meant—all that he desired.

But, Mr. President, the question now immediately before us is the one upon the reference of the bill with these instructions to the Committee on Appropriations. Without instructions, the matter would go to the Committee on Appropriations to report back such a bill as would carry into effect the wishes of the Senate so far as they can be adduced from the discussion that has taken place; and I think if there is anything that can be legitimately drawn from the discussion thus far, it is that the Senate is not ready to embark at full length as to any possible expenditure that might be made under an international exposition. These instructions evidently commit us to the whole length of an international exposition, whatever that may mean. I think that the friends of any exhibition make a very serious mistake in attempting, at this early day, to thrust that question prominently forward; and I therefore suggest to them whether they are not endangering even a national exhibition by thrusting this amendment forward. I do not believe that there is anything like a majority of the Senate in favor of the amendment proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] to the instructions moved by his colleague, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the amendment reported as it would read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, the amendment which I offered to the amendment of my colleague was offered after consultation with other gentlemen, with the belief that it would bring up a question on which the Senate would properly divide, under the hope that the little difficulty which surrounds this question in the way it has come before Congress this session might be avoided by that amendment. The course the debate has taken has led me to believe that that amendment, and a vote upon it, will at the present moment be of no service. Therefore I ask leave to withdraw it.

I have no doubt that the American Congress will in some shape, in some bill, at the proper time, meet the responsibilities which they have already incurred in this matter. I have no doubt that they will justify the expectations of the people in so conducting this matter that it shall be a credit to our country and a matter which we can all feel proud of. I have no disposition myself to press any peculiar view of my own upon the Senate or upon the country. Therefore I desire to withdraw the amendment I offered and let the vote be taken upon the amendment of my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SUMNER. Has not that already been voted on and rejected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been. A division was asked, and before the vote was taken the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] desired to submit some remarks; and no vote was taken on the amendment to the amendment, which was the question. The question is now on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] as instructions to the motion to refer.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say that upon all questions arising on this bill I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, Mr. MORTON. I am informed by the Senator from Pennsylvania farthest from me, [Mr. CAMERON,] who asked me to pair with him, that he would vote with that Senator on all questions arising on this bill, was of the same opinion with him, and therefore would vote in the same way; and I should vote the other way.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. CONKLING. I take this opportunity to say that the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. CARPENTER, has been compelled to leave the Senate from indisposition. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. CRAGIN, the Senator from New Hampshire being favorable to the bill and to amendments looking to its interest, and the Senator from Wisconsin being opposed to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

With instructions to report a bill making an appropriation of a sufficient sum of money from the Treasury of the United States, not exceeding $3,000,000, toward defraying the expenses of the centennial celebration and exhibition, to be held under the auspices of the United States at the city of Philadelphia in 1876, under such regulations as will secure the faithful application and expenditure of said appropriation.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I shall vote against these instructions, believing that if the bill is referred to the committee at all it should be referred to the committee with an opportunity to devise and present the best thing the committee knows how to do. I do not see how by saying it shall report not to exceed $3,000,000 we are going to aid it or aid ourselves especially.

Mr. STEWART. Then we can vote against the whole thing.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I think the Senate may be congratulated on this debate. It has beyond all question advanced the truth. You all remember how it opened—the confident tone of my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] with the arguments he presented; but one by one the arguments have been answered, and so day by day the cause that he represented so ably and assiduously has failed. Of this the public press is a record. I hold in my hand to-day's National Republican of this city, containing an article on the doings of Congress, and especially referring to what is known as the centennial bill, which it ardently espouses. Now, hear what this advocate says:

It would appear that early action is necessary for the safety of the bill, as this protracted debate is undoubtedly having a damaging effect upon its chances.

Such, sir, is the admission of a friend, that the chances of this bill are injured by debate. Sir, truth fears no light; a just cause cannot shrink from discussion. Therefore, when the friends of this measure urge instant action, saying that they lose by debate, they confess the infirmity of their cause.

Other things have been developed. At first, the proposition was innocent in form, nothing more than simply to carry out an existing statute; involving nothing; especially that there was no money in it. I felt it my duty to announce that it was an appropriation bill in disguise, for I saw clearly that without money the measure proposed was nothing; was not worth the paper on which it was written. Very little worthy was it of the debate which its friends challenged. It was only because it was an appropriation bill, or the beginning and the preamble to an appropriation bill, that it became of significance. Now, sir, its true character is seen. Even its friends do not deny that it is practically an appropriation bill; and one of its leading and most eloquent supporters has clinched this admission by an amendment in the nature of instructions to the committee, to report a bill appropriating $3,000,000 to carry forward this scheme. Therefore I do not err when I say it stands conspicuously before the Senate as an appropriation bill. I do not use too strong language. I am simply exhibiting the fact as it is beyond all question; giving to it special importance. We debate appropriation bills day by day. How often have I known questions, insignificant in amount compared with that now in issue, occupy the attention of this Chamber and of the other for days; and yet complaint is made that we have undertaken to discuss this question at a little length, very slightly, however, compared with its magnitude. Complaint is made on this account. Is it not most unjustly? The proposition on which we are to vote immediately commits the Senate to $3,000,000. Now does any one suppose that even this appropriation is the end of this business? Does any one suppose that if we vote $3,000,000 and declare this exhibition under the auspices of the nation, we can stop short of a sufficient sum to make the exhibition honorable to the nation? Can any one doubt this responsibility? Do my excellent friends, the Senators from Pennsylvania, doubt it? I know they say that this shall be on condition that no further appropriation shall be called for, that all the rest shall be found elsewhere; but will these corporators, for so I call them, regard the condition? Have we not too much evidence—too much evidence in the past? Notoriously they have disregarded the condition twice over in two different statutes, a condition openly recognized by their supporters in both Houses of Congress, that the United States should not be called upon for any contribution. Notoriously they have set that condition at naught; they have handed it over to oblivion, treating it as if it did not exist; and now they ask us to hand over $3,000,000 on the further condition that they shall not call again, but with no assurance that this condition will not be consigned to the same oblivion in which their predecessors are already overwhelmed.

Sir, I would not use too strong language, but I do feel that here is an attempt to commit Congress which ought to be resisted on the threshold, and which I do now resist. You all remember the somewhat remarkable expression which dropped from the pen of General Washington in one of his letters, when, alluding to moneys supplied to him, he said they were "but a flea-bite" compared to what he wanted—an expression which one of his editors regarded as too bold to be preserved, and he accordingly substituted a milder phrase. Sir, I content myself now with the language of Washington, when I say that the $3,000,000 now proposed will be but a "flea-bite" compared to what will be required if this swelling scheme is carried forward in the form announced, and in the propositions already presented to the Senate.

Sir, I cannot err; there can be no mistake about that. We have before us the experience of the Old World in the exhibitions already held. We know the large expenditures. We have the recent experience of Austria; and although there is a discrepancy in the testimony with regard to the cost or the sum total of cost on that occasion, yet what we do know, even the statement made to-day by my friend, the Senator from California, founded on a diplomatic dispatch from our minister at Vienna, is sufficient to warn us now. Why, sir, according to that dispatch the cost was 20,000,000 florins, gold, equal to $12,000,000 of our money. Now, does any one suppose that a structure equivalent in architectural character and in its equipment to that which recently excited the admiration of the visitor at Vienna can be reproduced in our country for the same sum it cost them at Vienna? Does any one suppose it can be done? Senators, look at it carefully and frankly. Will it not cost much more? Is there not a difference in labor between Philadelphia and Vienna which introduces at once an enormous discrepancy? If the exhibition at Vienna cost $12,000,000, will not the exhibition at Philadelphia, if organized on the same scale, cost $24,000,000? Will it cost a dollar less? Will the people of the United States, if once engaged in this considerable work, be content with an exhibition that shall fall short of that of Vienna? Will they not require that the art treasures assembled here shall find a temporary home in a palace that shall rival anything in Vienna? Will they be content with anything less? Should they be content with anything less?

I open this case on questions, and I should like the answer of my excellent friends. I know their patriotic impulses, their ambition for our natal land, and that they, of all, would desire that on that day it should be truly glorified, so that republican institutions should be enshrined not less worthily than the monarchies of Europe. I know that the Senators from Pennsylvania must be with me in this aspiration. I know they would not lend their sanction to any failure or short-coming; that they would insist upon the exhibition being carried through powerfully, grandly, magnificently, as becomes the destinies of the great Republic. Where, then, does that lead us in cost? Far, very far, beyond $3,000,000; far, very far, beyond $10,000,000; far beyond $15,000,000; I fear far beyond $20,000,000.

There is one reason that stands forth very plainly why this expense must be very great; I alluded to it when I had the honor of addressing the Senate the other day, but in a different connection; and it is that a World's Fair in 1876 will be an anachronism, out of season, premature, and without a sufficient interval between it and the preceding fair, that of Vienna. Now, be good enough, if you please, to bear in mind certain dates. The London Crystal Palace fair, which began these great festivals, was in 1851. France, filled with a noble emulation, followed with her first Universal Exhibition in 1855, four years later. Then came the London International Exhibition, the most successful of all, in 1862, seven years later. Next the Paris Universal Exhibition, so called, in 1867, five years after the London exhibition. And last arrived the Vienna International Exhibition in 1873, being six years after that of Paris. And now, sir, I believe all competent persons who were at Vienna testify that the Vienna exhibition was premature, that a sufficient interval had not been allowed to elapse after the great exhibition at Paris, so that it was in reality a great bazaar, a sort of Russian fair, rather than a place for comparison of inventions and to review scientific progress. And now we are called to institute another World's Fair after an interval of only three years, not five years, not six years, not seven years, but only three years; and consider, if you please, the extraordinary difficulties from distance, from intervening ocean, that must be overcome; and add to those difficulties the brief period between our proposed exhibition and its immediate predecessor, and you will see that from the nature of the case, in order to make your exhibition successful, you must spend money largely—just in proportion to the difficulties which you must overcome must the expenditures be. Therefore, again I say that the $3,000,000 you now propose are only a "flea-bite" compared with what you will be called to contribute. The "flea-bite" will be hard to bear now, in the present condition of the Treasury; but with this "flea-bite" swollen, enlarged, aggravated, I know not where we shall find the means to meet it.

But, sir, another topic has been introduced into this debate, which figures largely, and on which the advocates of this proposition expend argument and eloquence. It is, that the public faith is pledged. Sir, I do not know that I should have said a word to-day—I think I should not—but for the manner in which this argument has been pressed; and I may add, also, the personal allusions from time to time to myself in this connection. I know something of the origin of this original bill. I know to what extent the public faith is pledged. I am a witness, and I take the stand. The bill came from the other House, where it was introduced by a friend of this measure, being, as I understood, supplied to him by one of the Philadelphia associates. It passed the other House, as many measures too frequently pass that House, and came to the Senate. I think I may say the moment it was understood the feeling was adverse. It was said—I am speaking now of conversations—that it was on its face an impracticable measure, involving the country, possibly, in considerable expense. Then it was that Senators against it, or not inclining to its support, said, "Very well; if you will accept the bill with a condition relieving the United States from all liability, there will be no objection. It is in the nature of an act of incorporation; and we give you these large powers, but with no responsibility on the part of the United States." Such was the understanding, and such was the condition expressly, positively, openly introduced into the bill.

Senators speak of pledges, of conditions. Sir, there is but one real pledge in this bill; there is but one real condition. That pledge is, that the United States shall not be called to pay a dollar; the condition is that our Government is relieved of all responsibility on account of this undertaking; and that is the ruling condition to which all else is subordinate. Let me read it. Before I close on this head I shall have a curious parallel to present with the famous club of Mr. Pickwick:

> That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners, or other officers provided by this act, from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

Now, Mr. President, could language be plainer, more explicit? The United States is never to pay a dollar. And now, sir, the vista opens; we are to begin with $3,000,000 down, and nobody knows how many millions afterward; and yet the fundamental condition, was "The United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same." How, in the face of that condition, can Senators rise in this Chamber and speak of public faith as pledged to this measure? Sir, the public faith is the other way. You and I and all of us are bound to the people of the United States, by that condition embodied in the bill, that not a dollar shall be paid. That condition commended the bill originally to the people, because they saw that under it a generous corporation would undertake a service for which the country would be grateful; and the people saw that their taxes would not be increased, that their pockets would not be entered. But now the proposition is to increase the taxes and to enter the pockets to carry out this bill.

Look further, sir. The Senator from Pennsylvania on my right, [Mr. CAMERON,] while it was under discussion, expressly announced that Philadelphia would take the matter in hand, "just as any other great city of this country probably would do;" and then, again, in the ardor of his eloquence, that the money was to be raised "without expense to the Government." Then, again, "They ask nothing else of the Government;" that is than this charter, which they now have. "There is no doubt they will raise the money." "They will to-morrow go to work immediately to procure this money."

The other Senator, who represents this bill so indefatigably on this floor, [Mr. SCOTT,] said:

> When the subject was first introduced in Congress, it was feared that an appropriation would be asked. Everybody in both Houses was so sensitive on that question, that an express disavowal of all responsibility on the part of the Government had to be incorporated in the act.

There my friend admits the condition—"express disavowal of all responsibility on the part of the Government had to be incorporated in the act." Now, in the face of that condition, according to his own admission, incorporated in the act, he rises day by day in this Chamber and charges us who stand by the condition with a breach of public faith. Public faith, sir! Nothing is more beautiful, more sacred, sacrosanct, than the public faith, always to be preserved, and never to be invoked with levity; and permit me to say that when my friend invokes it on this occasion, it seems more like comedy than truth. Unquestionably the public faith is the other way. The public faith is solemnly pledged in this business to economy and to an absolute abnegation on the part of the United States.

Not content with this condition in one statute, the other statute, creating the financial board, repeats it:

> Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim, by the centennial international exhibition, or the corporation hereby created, for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States, in support or liquidation of any debt or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized.

And then we have the declaration of my excellent friend, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] while this measure was under discussion in the Senate, that "it simply authorizes the Philadelphia people, at their own expense, to have a show;" and he added, "as a private bill I hope it will be passed." So, sir, it was treated at the time, and if the question is asked, which I have heard more than once propounded, why it passed without opposition in this Chamber, why according to the record it was nem. con., the answer is easy, that all disinclined to the measure saw full well that by that careful provision, relieving the United States of all liability, they would hereafter be safe; that there would be no return to them, no call upon them, no clamor, no suggestion of public faith. All that was clearly recognized at the time; and that was the reason why the bill passed, as it did, without opposition. That was the reason why I sat silent in my seat. I had drafted that provision, and I was satisfied that it would hold; and I calmly said to all who spoke to me on the subject, "It is in the nature of a private bill; it creates a new and grand corporation for a patriotic purpose; let the corporators have their bill; the United States are not in any way involved."

Why, sir, the case of Mr. Pickwick and his club was renewed. He, you will remember, proposed to travel, and the club solemnly voted that Mr. Pickwick have leave to travel and correspond with the club at all times, paying his own expenses and his postage. [Laughter.] The provision in this bill was the precise equivalent of the permission received by that distinguished and venerable gentleman, so well known in literature, in history, and I may say also in politics, as Mr. Pickwick.

But that is not the only illustration. Every man of business knows that a bill of exchange is often indorsed, "without recourse." I will not give my definition of that phrase, but will read that of Webster's Dictionary, "Without recourse, words sometimes added to the indorsement of a negotiable instrument to protect the indorser from liability to the indorsee and subsequent holders." Here we have indorsee and subsequent holders; but the United States, by the provision to which I have referred, are completely secure against all resort from indorsee or subsequent holder. These corporators took this great business "without recourse" to the United States; and there I stand. "Without recourse." Let them proceed as they began. At all events, the Senate will adhere, I trust, to the original indorsement.

But I have something more to say—very briefly, however—on the way in which these corporators, if I may so express myself, worked into their present position. They came here for their bill; they obtained it with the condition that I have mentioned, a condition openly announced and accepted by their representatives on this floor, and also in the other House, accepted fully; and the venerable Senator from Pennsylvania on my right was so jubilant that he announced at once that they would obtain the money without delay. Ah, sir, does not the poet tell us:

> Fair laughs the morn, and soft the zephyr blows?

It was so with them. Their morning laughed, and the zephyr fanned their cheeks. They were confident of success. They began with their own immediate fellow-citizens, and there they failed. They then turned to the States; there again they failed; and now, sir, morning no longer laughing, and zephyr no longer blowing, they turn to the United States, and ask us to assume this great expense. There should have been more frankness originally. If the United States were at any time to be called to assume this expense they should have known it in advance. Nor is this all. The United States should have had the conduct of the whole business. It should not have been entered upon by a private corporation of stockholders. Permit me to say in a certain sense they are usurpers; occupying supreme national function. Thus far all World's Fairs have been govsrnmental in origin and conduct, and I see no reason in our national condition why we should be an exception. I do not find that we have facilities for massing capital and obtaining the means for a great World's Fair that should make us an exception to the received rule and practice of other nations. The World's Fair should have been in the hands of the nation. And now still further I am about to say that in my judgment a proper celebration of the one hundredth natal day of the Republic should have been by the nation and not by any private corporation. But these private corporators have worked themselves into the business. The authentic story of the Siberian bear is revived. You all remember it. The bear leaped upon a horse, and he ate so furiously that he absolutely ate his way into the harness and drew the sledge. I know not if our Philadelphia bear has not already eaten itself into the harness. But has not the time come to stop? I think we must give the bear notice to quit; at least let him know that he cannot drag this nation into any World's Fair.

Now, sir, allow me to say that I have three earnest desires in connection with our coming anniversary:

First. To secure a proper commemoration of that great day, truly worthy of this Republic, and characteristic, so that republican institutions shall thereby gain;

Secondly. To save the national character, which must suffer if the present scheme is pursued; and Thirdly, to save the national Treasury.

For these reasons I trust that this bill, which is so justly revealed as an appropriation bill, should be referred to the committee having charge of such bills; and it should be referred without any further instructions than are abundantly found in the existing legislation of Congress and in the open declarations of the friends of this measure on other occasions, when they declared that the United States should be called upon for no contribution. Twice over has Congress given instructions on this very point—not merely the Senate, but both Houses of Congress, with the approval of the President; twice over in two different bills; once, twice. I hope that the present bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that it will take its instructions from existing acts of Congress.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I certainly had no idea of participating in this debate until within about an hour. I am without a note; I have made no preparation; and have perhaps but few ideas to express. I am reminded of the fact that it is said "it is easy to swim in deep water," and I certainly, in the sense that I am looking to, find myself thus situated on this occasion. I am in the mighty sea between my distinguished friend on my right from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and the distinguished gentleman from California on my left, [Mr. SARGENT.] They have electrified the Senate with their eloquent discourses. They have acquitted themselves well, and surely to their own satisfaction. I regretted, however, to hear a remark or two dropped by my friend from California, to which I venture to allude. I wish he were close by; I have not the pleasure of seeing him now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He is near at hand.

Mr. FLANAGAN. O, I am gratified to see him now. My friend remarked, among many objections, with force, that it would possibly be said that our action here, if this bill was passed by the Senate, would bring up in the country, the eyes of the people of the Union being upon us, recollections of the great Credit Mobilier scandal. I regret very much if my friend was serious in the idea that there are any such influences as are known to this proud nation in that connection, associated with this great national enterprise. I hope my friend had no such idea.

Mr. SARGENT. I merely said that if there were scandal in this country we should have the full benefit of it in the presidential election, and our experience is not favorable to the handling of large amounts of money by individuals; that it was very difficult to hedge it around so that we could avoid scandals. That was the force of my argument. I did not mean to imply anything of the kind up to this time.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Unfortunate, it appears to me, to have had the expression drop from so distinguished a republican as my friend is, when he was admonishing the Senate as to its action, and as to what might be charged, either properly or improperly, upon that question directly or remotely. It would at least give a basis for those who are ever ready to take hold of anything that would tend to injure our grand party.

But, sir, I was further amused at the idea of my distinguished friend directly in line on that subject, when he said that the republican party will be responsible for their action in this case. I reflect that if so at least they may be gratified to know that they will have the old Keystone State, with her valor that has upheld republican principles stoutly, standing by them. I am delighted to know that Delaware, in her pride and a jewel as she is, and brave old New Jersey, "true blue," likewise are directly associated with her, making a beautiful trio to lead off in triumph for the republican party. Thus we are not much endangered even upon that view of the subject. Then so far as Massachusetts is concerned, that proud old republican State, I am proud to know, Senators know, this nation knows, that she has gone through the fiery ordeal, as is well known to her great Senator who has just addressed us with such ability, as he always does, with such warmth and zeal in opposition to this bill. He had the fondness of the proud old State, and especially Boston—I love the name—that Boston which threw the tea overboard; and with all the considerations associated with him, and all the power and influence of the distinguished Senator, he could not pull old Massachusetts from her solid moorings in the sea of republicanism a short time since. Then I take it that with Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Massachusetts, and a host of others, if we do nothing worse to put down the republican party of this nation, we have nothing to fear.

Mr. President, a strong argument here is, without inviting any outside facts and considerations, that this measure is objectionable because it will require an appropriation from the United States Treasury. There is no school-boy that does not understand that fact. My distinguished friend in his candor, and I always love it from him, says he is perfectly familiar with this bill, the manner of its introduction to the Senate, and all that sort of thing. That is conclusively proved; and from that very history I feel committed upon this subject. I speak for myself when I say that when the original bill was introduced I thought I knew what the future would be. Then the movement was in its infancy. I knew it would expand; I knew it would grow. I have participated in legislation, not a great deal in Congress, but in smaller bodies, for a quarter of a century. I have voted for appropriations to build state-houses, land offices, and such things, and I know how they grow.

Well, by the way, what is the history of the nation? You appropriate $100,000 or $500,000 or $1,000,000, as the case may be, in the first instance, for a public work. Architects and engineers figure up most beautifully what it will cost, and present their estimate, and the advocates of the bill say, "Here is the entire cost; perhaps there will be a little left out of the appropriation." I have never found any. The next year we always appropriate further, and we are still appropriating broadcast to many buildings in the United States. The States and the Union are alike in that particular. You are appropriating every year for this beautiful capital, the pride of the nation.

I recollect that I remarked at the time the bill of 1871 was introduced, "Ah, yes; this is an introduction, but this is not the last of it. Monsieur Tonson will come again." I knew that very well. I recognized it; I recognize it now, and I am going to advocate it. I will make him a welcome visitor on this occasion so far as I am concerned.

I am told it will deplete and ruin and bankrupt the United States. I have heard much about bankrupting the United States. I have heard it here remarked, too, that solemn pledges in legislation are to be strictly adhered to. I wish most earnestly that that was the doctrine. I wish it was our experience; if it was, (I hope it will not be considered that I am digressing, because I think it is directly in line now when we are speaking of the Treasury of the United States,) we should have to resume specie payments directly, and I should be very much pleased with that idea; but, notwithstanding the solemn pledge we have made in that respect, we are not exactly resuming up to this time. Therefore, if there be a sacred pledge in this law that no money is ever to be required, the same Senators who are voting one or the other way may reconcile it as best they can, and it is not hard to do, I think. But in a pecuniary point of view it occurs to me that there are some ideas which might be very well advanced here. I am not one of those who are ready to say that it is not a good appropriation, not with a view of lavish or prodigal expenditure on the part of the nation, but that it is simply like the farmer who goes into his field and sows his acre of wheat, rye, or oats, as the case may be, with the expectation at an early day, when the seed shall mature into the crop, to gather fifty bushels perhaps for the one. That is the idea; make this appropriation, invite the world if you please, earls, dukes, princes, lords, potentates, and kings, and let them come. They will be likely to do so; and when they come they will come with their gold, and they will come with large amounts. The immigrants to our country now annually bring us in $25,000,000 of gold. They do not come with irredeemable paper, such as we have, and I am not boasting of that either, but such are the facts, except that I am gratified that they come.

Now, the balance of trade is against us annually, to the tune of many millions. I have no data before me because, as I remarked, I have not dotted down a reference or anything else. I only have in my mind the facts that I am familiar with. Then the millions that are expended by our travelers for pleasure and upon business in Europe annually are immense. Let us invite these crowned heads to come here; let them come and their representatives; let them see and realize what we are, and let us get the balance of trade to set toward the New World, as it naturally should instead of the Old, and at an early day we shall thereby be enabled to resume specie payments. Even in that point of view, I would be gratified to know that within from four to six months, while we had these crowned heads from Europe, they would be looking to and through our country with delight. They would see the vast power of the United States demonstrated in Pennsylvania's old city of Philadelphia. There they would see Independence Hall, where the immortal Washington and Carroll sat, and a host of others that I might name, proud spirits that have departed this life long since. They would be delighted to look there; and while there, the noble Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company would give them tickets to go West. It would be the delight of all the great railroad corporations, I have no hesitancy in saying, in this vast Union, to invite them into the States, and every State would be competing to get them to visit its localities. They would look at our mighty fields—mighty in every sense of the word. I should be gratified to show them our great cotton fields in Texas. Louisiana would want to have them looking over her sugar plantations. Pennsylvania would have them in the first instance, but the other States directly lying on that line west, like Illinois and Indiana, would want to show them their mighty fields with their sheep, their large herds, to the tune of thousands on thousands. I should like to see them go into Texas, and there they would see cattle not ranging merely on a thousand hills, but they would see them there in millions. I speak not too largely when I thus state. They would see them there spread over the prairies; they would see the best land known to civilized man. These lords and kings, if you please, would invest their money there; most of them are men of brains, and they would see a fine opportunity. Money is cheap in England. I have heard here much said about cheap money. They would find cheap real estate here, and they would purchase it. I think it is a good idea; it is a grand scheme.

I know nothing about how it was gotten up originally, as my distinguished friend from Massachusetts seems to do; but if the idea had ever been presented to me, I should have advocated it then as I do now, and I would even advocate it as an individual enterprise for the purpose of realizing a good speculation out of it. I do not think the United States Treasury, or the people of the Union, will be called upon to pay higher taxes on account of the expenditure that it may require to get up this grand enterprise; but if they be, as I have already said, I think it will be at an early period paid back to them with a large interest. We have nothing to fear.

I have heard many distinguished Senators who can speak much more fluently and better than I can portray these facts more admirably and happily. My distinguished friend from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] however, I believe, rather fears to interview lords and kings, this, that, and the other. He thinks it would be in bad taste. I think my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, too, rather deprecates that idea. Why, great God, are we fearful of any man on earth? None under the sun. Are we afraid of ourselves, that we will expose ourselves on that occasion in their presence, not knowing how to deport ourselves? Surely not. We are better raised than that; we are Americans; we tower over all such considerations; we simply tender them the right hand of fellowship, recognizing them for the time being, and while they conduct themselves properly, as our equals. That is all. We do not beg them to receive us thus and so. They will be our guests. They are well raised, and they will deport themselves well. I have no idea of expressions being used that would be grating upon their ears by any gentleman or gentlemen who would be the orators of the day on that occasion. Sure I am that if my distinguished friend from Massachusetts were permitted to respond to an invitation—and I take it that he would be placed at the head of the list, for his would be one of the first names selected by any committee that would have the authority to designate them—responded and addressed them, he has so profound a regard and respect for them that he would not wound their feelings even remotely. Then there would be no danger. Let them come and realize who we are and what we are. Let them come to us at home. Our homes, humble though they are, are to us as dear as the greatest palace known to a monarch is to him.

I advocate this measure feeling that I was committed to it originally and understandingly. I would not pretend to plead here that I was so green as not to have recognized what would be the result upon the first presentation. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I intend to support the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

Mr. DENNIS. On this question I beg leave to state that my colleague [Mr. HAMILTON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. PATTERSON. My colleague would vote against the measure in all its phases, and the Senator from South Carolina would vote for it.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the motion to refer by adding:

With instructions to report a bill making an appropriation of a sufficient sum of money from the Treasury of the United States, not exceeding $3,000,000, towards defraying the expenses of the centennial celebration and exhibition to be held under the auspices of the United States, at the city of Philadelphia, in 1876, under such regulations as will secure the faithful application and expenditure of said appropriation.

Mr. INGALLS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. FERRY. If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. WADLEIGH.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Clayton, Dennis, Dorsey, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Logan, Pease, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Stockton, and West—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Fenton, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pratt, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, Sprague, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ISAAC STROHM, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2347) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Connecticut Historical Society certain papers on file as vouchers for the discharged claims of the heirs of Silas Deane.

ENROLLED BILL.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEST. I move to take up the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Louisiana will not move to take up the Army appropriation bill, because I hope that on Monday the Senate will be prepared to go on with the finance bill; but at all events I appeal to the Senator to let that matter of the order of business be determined on Monday morning, when we can no doubt make an arrangement between ourselves.

Mr. WEST. I should have no objection to yielding in favor of the finance question were I satisfied that the Finance Committee would be ready to go on with the finance question on Monday. I move now to take up the Army appropriation bill, with the understanding that on Monday I shall waive it in preference to finance, if the finance question is ready.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. If I can have the attention of the Senate I want to say one word. Yesterday morning, it will be remembered that, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the bill known as the liquor-commission bill was laid aside and made the special order to follow immediately the centennial bill. That was done by unanimous consent, and now I trust that nothing will be allowed to intervene, but that I shall have the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with and dispose of that bill at present. I think we can do it this afternoon. I am certain we ought to do it in a very few moments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take it up now.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I trust my friend from Louisiana will withdraw his motion, and it will be the first business in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana withdraw his motion?

Mr. WEST. I can renew it afterward. I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give fair notice that on Monday morning I shall move to take up the finance bill.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there was a general agreement to take up the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WRIGHT. It was the order of the Senate that it should follow immediately the centennial bill. I asked unanimous consent, and the Chair announced that there was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I hope we shall have the vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope so, too; but I wish to say to my friend from Iowa, that while I agreed very cordially to his proposition that this bill for a liquor commission should follow the centennial bill, I must protest against his bringing it up every day in the morning hour. We have been devoting that hour to those bills that nobody has any particular interest in, but which are of very great importance to American citizens. They are the orphans, the foundlings, that are put into our care, and we ought not to devote the morning hour to any disputed questions. If the Senator from Iowa now moves to take up this bill, which I shall vote for, it will be with the understanding, on my part at least, that it is not to come up in the morning hour, to displace the undisputed bills.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not move to take it up. It was made a special order at this time at the request of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but with the distinct understanding that it should not be taken up in the morning hour; and yet five minutes after that understanding was had the Senator from Iowa called up his bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. My good friend makes a very great mistake. It was the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that insisted on proceeding with the bill, and there was no objection made at the time. My understanding was that it was passed over till this time; but the Senator from Ohio said, the morning hour not having expired, we could as well proceed with this bill, and there was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I stand corrected then. The Finance Committee are always making trouble in the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Now I trust we shall have the vote on this bill, and get it out of the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, as amended by the Senate, which is to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, neither of whom shall be the holder of any office of profit or trust in the General or a State government. The said commissioners shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed one year. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic and manufacture, having special reference to revenue and taxation, distinguishing as far as possible, in the conclusions they arrive at, between the effects produced by the use of distilled or spirituous liquors as distinguished from the use of fermented or malt liquors, in their economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States, and the effect produced by such legislation upon the consumption of distilled or spirituous liquors and fermented or malt liquors, and also to ascertain whether the evil of drunkenness has been increased or decreased thereby, whether the use of opium as a stimulant and substitute for alcoholic drinks has become more general in consequence of such legislation, and whether public morals have been improved thereby. It shall also be the duty of said commissioners to gather information and take testimony as to whether the evil of drunkenness exists to the same extent, or more so, in other civilized countries, and whether those foreign nations that are considered the most temperate in the use of stimulants are so through prohibitory laws; and also to what degree prohibitory legislation has affected the consumption and manufacture of malt and spirituous liquors in this country.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners, all of whom shall not be advocates of prohibitory legislation or total abstinence in relation to alcoholic or fermented liquors, shall serve without salary; shall be authorized to employ a secretary at a reasonable compensation, not to exceed $2,000 per year, which, with the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation, (not exceeding $10,000,) of both the secretary and commissioners, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and for this purpose the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation, and the expenses attending the same, to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time.

Mr. BAYARD. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 21: as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Dorsey, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sumner, West, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Stockton—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—26.

So the bill was passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2347) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Connecticut Historical Society certain papers on file as vouchers for the discharged claims of the heirs of Silas Deane was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the bill for the equalization of the currency be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. LOGAN. I take the floor, with the view, however, of yielding to my friend from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] if he is here on Monday; if not, I propose then to proceed with the argument of the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 6, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TIMBER ON WESTERN PRAIRIES.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," and concur in the Senate amendments to the same.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

On page 3, line 27 of section 2, strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to read:

And if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within five years thereafter, the person making such entry, &c.

Add to section 2 of the bill the following:

And in case of the death of a person who has complied with the provisions of this act for the period of three years, his heirs or legal representatives shall have the option to comply with the provisions of this act, and receive, at the expiration of eight years, a patent for one hundred and sixty acres, or receive without delay a patent for forty acres, relinquishing all claim to the remainder.

Strike out section 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That if at any time after the filing of said affidavit, and prior to the issuing of the patent for said land, the claimant shall abandon the land, or fail to do the breaking and planting required by this act, or any part thereof, or shall fail to cultivate, protect, and keep in good condition such timber, then, and in that event, such land shall be subject to entry under the homestead laws, or by some other person under the provisions of this act: Provided, That the party making claim to said land, either as a homestead settler or under this act, shall give, at the time of filing his application, such notice to the original claimant as shall be prescribed by the rules established by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the rights of the parties shall be determined as in other contested cases.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the Senate amendments be concurred in. There is no objection to them; they are all in harmony with the purpose of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF SURVEY OF THE UTE COUNTRY.

Mr. CHAFFEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of a report from Lieutenant E. H. Ruffner, Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, of a reconnaissance in the Ute country, in Colorado, made during the year 1873.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent that a session be held this evening for debate only upon the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroads among the several States.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—FRANKING BILL.

Mr. LOWNDES. Mr. Speaker, I was compelled to be absent from the House on yesterday. I am opposed to the franking bill that was then under discussion. If I had been present I would have voted against it.

REORGANIZATION OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reorganize the clerical force of the General Land Office, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the report accompanying the same be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House, at his earliest convenience, the names and post-office addresses of all the pension agents in the service of the Government, with the number of pensioners paid by each for the quarter ending on the 4th day of January, 1874, with a statement of the salary, fees, and emoluments received by each agent for the last year.

Upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] an order of the House was made, under a suspension of the rules, that it might be in order to move an amendment to the pension appropriation bill, to abolish the payment of pensions by agents. In order that the House may act intelligently on that proposition when it shall be presented, it is proper that we should have this information from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to suggest a modification of the resolution. Before the war, under the old system, payments were made to pensioners by agents. I suggest to the gentleman to include in his resolution a call for information as to how many agents there were, how many pensioners, and the cost of payment under the old law.

Mr. SPEER. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please reduce the modification of his resolution to writing.

EPIDEMIC CHOLERA.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Commerce the amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 29, authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera, with a recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. COX. I will reserve my right to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection will be in order after the amendments have been reported.

The Senate amendments were then read by the Clerk.

Mr. COX. I must object to this joint resolution. Let the amendments be referred.

Mr. BROMBERG. They have been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and this is their report. The Senate have done nothing more than to make some clerical corrections, and to add the supervising surgeon of marine hospitals to the Surgeon-General of the Army to take charge of this matter.

Mr. COX. I cannot understand these amendments from their reading. I must object.

MEDICAL CORPS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WOODFORD, by unanimous consent, presented memorials of the New York Academy of Medicine, New York Pathological Society, and other medical societies of New York, in regard to increasing the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the Army, and asked that the same be printed, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and also printed in the RECORD.

The motion was agreed to.

The memorials were as follows:

Action of the New York Academy of Medicine in support of a movement by the American Medical Association to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

At a regular meeting of the New York Academy of Medicine, held January 7, 1874, a committee of three, consisting of Drs. Gurdon Buck, Frank H. Hamilton, and John C. Peters, was appointed to report on the present condition of the Medical Corps of the United States Army.

At the next stated meeting the following resolutions were read and unanimously adopted.

[L. S.]

AUSTIN STONE, M. D., President.
W. T. WHITE, M. D., Secretary.

Resolved, That the New York Academy of Medicine do hereby cordially unite with the American Medical Association in its memorial to Congress in support of a bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army of the United States, now before that honorable body. They consider it an act of justice that the members of so important a branch of the service, gentlemen of the highest professional attainments and excellence of character, and charged with such weighty and responsible duties, should have the same relative rank and enjoy the same emoluments as members of the other staff corps of the Army; that it be respectfully urged upon the members of Congress of the State of New York to use their influence in support of the bill in question; that a copy of the above resolutions, duly authenticated, together with a copy of the memorial pamphlet, be furnished to each member of Congress.

Resolved also, That a copy of these proceedings be furnished for publication to the medical journals.

JOHN C. PETERS, M. D., Chairman.
GURDON BUCK, M. D.,
Surgeon New York Hospital, and of Saint Luke's Hospital.
FRANK H. HAMILTON, M. D.,
Surgeon-in-Chief of the Reception Hospital, New York City, and Surgeon Bellevue Hospital and Saint Francis.

JANUARY 15, 1874.

The above resolutions, passed by the New York Academy of Medicine, were read and unanimously adopted at the regular meeting of the New York Pathological Society, on Wednesday evening, February 25, 1874.

H. KNAPP, M. D., President.
GEORGE F. SHRADY, Secretary.

Action of the Medical Library and Journal Association of New York.

Whereas the American Medical Association, at its meeting in Saint Louis, May, 1873, appointed a committee to memorialize the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in relation to increasing the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army; and whereas said committee has prepared such memorial and prepared a bill embodying such amendments to the present laws of the United States as it is believed will add dignity to the medical staff of the Army: Therefore,

Resolved, That this association cordially indorses the action of the aforesaid committee, and respectfully adds thereto the weight of its influence, in the hope that Congress will pass the bill proposed.

Resolved, That while it is an established American principle to educate the people in order that they may be fitted to intelligently and patriotically perform the duties of citizenship, it seems pre-eminently proper for the nation to recognize the genius and fidelity of those occupying public positions by a corresponding honorary and pecuniary reward.

Resolved, That the achievements of our Army surgeons, aided by the liberality of Congress, have largely contributed to our national greatness, and at home and abroad are regarded with the merit they deserve.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to J. M. Toner, M. D., secretary of the committee of the American Medical Association, for such use as may best subserve the purpose for which they have been prepared.

GOUVERNEUR M. SMITH, M. D.,
Chairman.
JOEL FOSTER, M. D.
MATLOCK CHEESEMAN, M. D.

The above resolutions were read and unanimously adopted at a regular meeting of the Medical Library and Journal Association of New York, on Friday evening, January 23, 1874.

JOHN C. PETERS, M. D.,
President.
ANDREW H. SMITH, M. D.,
Physician to Saint Luke's Hospital, Secretary.

At a meeting of the comitia minora of the Medical Society of the County of New York, held at the house of the president, Dr. Ellsworth Eliot, on the afternoon of Wednesday, January 21, 1874, on the motion of Dr. John C. Peters, a committee of three, consisting of Drs. H. B. Sands, Alfred C. Post, and Isaac E. Taylor, was appointed to consider the best method of increasing the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

On Monday evening, January 26, 1874, at a regular meeting of the Medical Society of the County of New York, the chairman, Dr. H. B. Sands, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That this society cordially indorse the action of the American Medical Association, held at Saint Louis, in May, 1873, and the resolution of the Academy of Medicine, adopted on January 15, 1874, and those of Medical Library and Journal Association of New York, on January 23, 1874.

H. B. SANDS, M. D.,
Professor of Anatomy College of Physicians and Surgeons, Medical Department of Columbia College, New York.
ALFRED C. POST, M. D.,

SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. AVERILL. On Saturday last a bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and referred, I think, by an error of the Clerk, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is House bill No. 420, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the bands of Upper and Lower Sioux Indians. I ask that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it a private bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a private bill.

The motion of Mr. AVERILL was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock. The call of committees for reports of a private nature will be resumed.

WILLIAM YOUNG.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I am directed by the Committee on Patents to report back the petition of William Young, for compensation for the use of his patent galley in the Navy; and to move that the Committee on Patents be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Committee on Naval Affairs will, of course, consider carefully everything that the House may refer to them; but we have already reported back two propositions similar to this, and have asked their reference to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. This claim of William Young is for compensation for the use of a galley or cooking-range used in naval vessels. I take it for granted that it is a part of the naval equipment, and that therefore the subject is peculiarly germane to the business of the Naval Committee. As a matter of course we do not wish to impose any more work on that committee than is proper.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I make no objection to the reference of this petition to our committee.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on Patents were of opinion that perhaps the Committee on Naval Affairs might wish to give a direction in this matter to the claims commission, and therefore preferred to have the paper go to that committee first.

The motion of Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, was agreed to, and the petition was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

STATUE OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to contract with some suitable and skillful sculptor for a bronze statue of the late Admiral Farragut, as authorized in the joint resolution of April 16, 1872, to be disposed of as therein directed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to take up the time of the House in discussing this matter. The object being so meritorious, I hope it will so commend itself to every member of the House that the measure will need no discussion to secure its passage. I will, as briefly as possible, state what has heretofore been done by Congress in an effort to procure a suitable statue to commemorate the life and deeds of that greatest of all naval heroes, Admiral Farragut.

In the Forty-second Congress, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, acting upon a petition presented to Congress by members of his late staff and many of the most eminent naval officers of our service, reported to this House a joint resolution which was adopted without a dissenting voice, and which, being subsequently passed by the Senate, became law. I ask the Clerk to read that joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to authorize the erection of a colossal statue of the late Admiral Farragut.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to inspect all models for a colossal statue of the late Admiral Farragut that may be presented to them on or before the 1st of January, 1873, and select therefrom, within thirty days thereafter, the one that in their judgment shall be the most faithful likeness in form and feature, and the most appropriate to commemorate the deeds and character of the said admiral; and that the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to contract with the sculptor who shall have prepared the model so selected, for a colossal statue of the said admiral, at a cost not exceeding twenty thousand dollars, to be erected in Farragut Square, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, or in such other place as he may designate: Provided, That if no such model shall be presented on or before the time designated which the said committees shall agree upon as a work of art entirely worthy as a tribute of the nation to the naval hero whose memory it is proposed to commemorate, they may reject any and all so presented, and report the fact to their respective Houses.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. In pursuance of the provisions of that resolution, the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives and of the Senate had several meetings. The artists of this and other countries were invited to present models for inspection; and that invitation was embraced by a large number of artists both in this country and abroad. Gentlemen will recollect that for several months we had at the other end of the Capitol, in a room under the Senate, a collection of the models presented under that invitation, which models were, while they remained there, inspected by members of both Houses, and were especially examined by the committees of the two Houses having charge of this subject. Those committees held a number of meetings and endeavored to come to some decision as to which of the models presented should be adopted. They were, however, unable to agree; and in pursuance of the resolution under which they acted, the following report was presented on the last day of the last session to the House, a similar report being presented in the Senate by the committee of that body:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in accordance with the provisions of the joint resolution "to authorize the erection of a colossal statue of the late Admiral Farragut," approved April 16, 1872, submit the following report:

That they have inspected all models for a colossal statue of the late Admiral Farragut that have been presented to them; and, after a full conference with the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, have been unable to agree on a choice, and therefore report the facts to the House, as directed by a provision of the resolution.

No further action was taken by Congress on the subject; and knowing from past experience that it is impossible for a body of men containing so many members to agree upon a subject of this kind, the committee of the House having had the subject under consideration, have reported the resolution which we now ask the House to adopt. It provides that the Secretary of the Navy, who by the former resolution had charge of the expenditure of the money that was to be appropriated for this purpose, shall himself select the artist to execute this work. We make this proposition because the experience of Congress in this effort to honor the memory of Admiral Farragut has been exactly the same that has always attended any attempt to reach a conclusion on any subject of art, whether a statue or picture; and because it is much easier for one gentleman to make a decision on a question of this kind than it is for a body.

He will have in this decision the assistance of the friends of the late Admiral and of gentlemen who are experts in art. And we believe by the adoption of this resolution almost the unanimous wish of this Congress and of the people of the country may be met, and a suitable statue in commemoration of the life and deeds of Admiral Farragut secured to the country. As the subject is well understood, I will now demand the previous question.

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman agreed to yield to me.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut for a few minutes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer the following amendment, to which I think the committee will not object, and which I hope the House will adopt.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the resolution these words:

Provided, That the selection of the sculptor or artist to execute the statue shall be made by the Secretary of the Navy, the General of the Army, and Mrs. Virginia Farragut, or a majority of them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I offer that amendment for this reason: it is not amenable to the objection which the gentleman from Virginia has indicated, that of raising a committee that cannot decide; for it provides this committee of three, or a majority of them, shall make a selection of the statue. I have selected the name of the General of the Army, because he was so intimate with Admiral Farragut and knew him so well, and that of Mrs. Farragut; for if any person on earth ought to know a statue that resembles our great Admiral it should be Mrs. Farragut. I think this amendment is not liable to the objection that there can be no decision made, for it is a committee which must make a decision, as it provides that the majority shall select the statue. I hope the amendment will commend itself to the good sense of the House. I think Mrs. Farragut should be consulted. I think it eminently proper she should have a voice in the selection of the statue of Admiral Farragut.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will permit the amendment to come in to be voted on.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. COX. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut by adding the names of Albert Bierstadt and Edward Church to the commission to decide upon this statue. They are eminent artists; they are painters; they are not sculptors, but they are men of rare taste, and fair men; and unless this House wants to decorate this Capitol so the next generation will be iconoclasts to break down the decorations we appropriate money for, they had better go on some other principle than naming a commission such as my friend here designates. Why should the Secretary of the Navy be an especial judge of art? Why should the honored widow of Admiral Farragut simply decide on the resemblance of a stone statue to her husband, and call it art? Why should General Sherman, who is accomplished in many ways, be an especial judge of statues? At least, from this time forward, let us select men who are artists—fair artists—who may make this building what it ought to be—a building for the future; for the growing taste of the future, as well as for the elegant taste of the present.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will accept my amendment. It does not disturb his present amendment but only adds a little taste to what he has already given to the House in the way of respect for the officers of the Army and Navy.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will allow the amendment to be voted on, and will now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX's amendment was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. KELLOGG was adopted.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMANUEL SMALL AND JAMES TATE.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2207) making an appropriation to pay Emanuel Small and James Tate, of Atchison County, Missouri, for carrying the mails, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

OLIVER POWERS.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 366) for the relief of Oliver Powers; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF J. B. ARMSTRONG

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) in the matter of the payment of certain moneys appropriated to the estate of J. B. Armstrong, deceased, to the administrator; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. W. ELLIOTT.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 310) for the relief of W. W. Elliott; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS T. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, also from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1297) for the relief of Thomas T. Crittenden, of Missouri; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

TIMOTHY D. CROOK.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back papers in the case of Timothy D. Crook; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be laid on the table, and the accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LAFAYETTE WARD.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the memorial of Lafayette Ward, asking compensation for the use by the United States of the invention known as the Ward patent mail-bag catcher; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, that it be laid on the table, and the accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL L. HIGHLYMAN.

Mr. NUNN, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 691) for the relief of Samuel L. Highlyman, formerly deputy collector of the fifth district, Missouri; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN CLINTON.

Mr. NUNN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2345) for the relief of John Clinton, postmaster at Brownsville, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PERRY BROYLES.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 88) for the relief of Perry Broyles; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. A. SAYLOR.

Mr. BURROWS also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2346) for the relief of W. A. Saylor, of Bryan, Texas, for internal-revenue taxes illegally assessed and collected during the years 1867 and 1868; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BURROWS also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 24) relative to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF SILAS DEANE.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 48) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Connecticut Historical Society certain papers on file as vouchers for the discharged claims of the heirs of Silas Deane.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Connecticut Historical Society the papers now on file in the Treasury Department as vouchers in support of the claims of the heirs of Silas Deane, it being understood that those claims have been fully satisfied and discharged, and that the heirs aforesaid have transferred to said historical society all the papers of historical interest left by said Silas Deane.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I presume nobody will object to the passage of this joint resolution. I am instructed by the committee to offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of the joint resolution the following:
Provided, That copies of said papers shall be left on file in said Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask that the joint resolution be changed into a bill.

There was no objection, and the bill, (H. R. No. 2347,) as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REV. GEORGE MORRISON.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2348) for the relief of the Rev. George Morrison, late of Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BURKE & KUNKEL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2349) for the relief of Burke & Kunkel; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEMUEL C. RISLEY.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 799) for the relief of Lemuel C. Risley, late a second lieutenant of the Eighty-fifth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. PEAK AND OTHERS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of William F. Peak and others; and the same was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT PARRIS L. REED.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1403) for the relief of Lieutenant Parris L. Reed; and the same was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

ISSUE OF A NEW REGISTER.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2350) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a certificate of registry and enrollment to the schooner Almina and changing the name to Minnie Davis; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. POTTER. I would inquire whether the testimony shows what moneys have been expended upon this vessel by the present owner?

Mr. WHEELER. The affidavits accompanying the claim show that the vessel has been largely repaired, so as to come within the rule adopted by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POTTER. How largely?

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot tell definitely; but the cost of the repairs amount to more than one-half of the value of the vessel.

Mr. MERRIAM. Nearly three-fourths.

Mr. POTTER. Then it is just this case: Here is a British vessel which, under the general law, could not be admitted to registry; but some one gets hold of her for a small sum, because she is not entitled to registry, and spends a certain amount of money on her, and then comes to the Committee on Commerce and asks them to recommend a registry, and the Committee on Commerce in this case recommend it.

Now, I am in favor, within proper limits, of free ships, but as long as the law prevents the registration of foreign bottoms it ought to extend to every one. This giving to one man permission to bring in a foreign-built vessel is like giving to one man permission to bring in a case of goods without paying the duties upon them. It is founded on no principle of law or justice, but the contrary, and ought not to be tolerated.

Mr. WHEELER. There was no attempt at evasion of the registry laws in this case that the committee are aware of.

Mr. WOOD. I think this bill subject to yet graver objections than those urged by my colleague, [Mr. POTTER.] Like him, I am in favor of free ships, but as long as we pursue the policy of taxation upon the materials which enter into the construction of ships, we should make no discrimination against our own ships by the free introduction and change of registership of foreign-constructed vessels, that pay no tax either in duties upon the imported materials of which the vessel is constructed, or a direct tax, as we have heretofore imposed by our laws on the materials which enter into the construction of ships.

Now, of course, as the representative of a commercial community, I am in favor of bringing in as many vessels, whether foreign or native bottoms, as can possibly come in; but when men will buy for a song vessels that are wrecked, or partly wrecked, built in foreign lands, come here, and by a simple application to the Committee on Commerce procure an American register to put that vessel in all respects upon the same footing with our own vessels, which are built in this country and upon which we tax our own citizens very heavily, I say we ought not to grant them what they ask. While there are cases in which we should grant this change of register, I do not think the practice should be carried to the extent that the Committee on Commerce carry it under existing circumstances.

Mr. CONGER. I am glad to see my friends on the other side, who are in favor of free ships, coming to the rescue of this question so earnestly.

There are in the minds of the Committee on Commerce special reasons for the recommendation in this case. My friend from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] an old member of the Committee on Commerce, knows that it was no easy matter to procure a recommendation from the former committee, nor is it from the present committee for such a bill as this.

Mr. POTTER. I took it for granted that there were some reasons for this extraordinary recommendation, and so I asked for them.

Mr. CONGER. In former days these objections did not come from my friend from New York. It is well, perhaps, that we are beginning to see things alike. This vessel is a small craft, owned by Bruce M. Davis, an American, and employed on the Saint Lawrence. It has been owned by him a great many years; and under Canadian laws he has been allowed to run it nominally under the name of another master, although he has had the use and control of it himself. It is used for transporting freight and passengers among the islands of the Saint Lawrence, and partly as a pleasure-boat. It is not engaged particularly in any great commercial transactions. We might say that since the present ownership it has been almost entirely rebuilt. All that is of substantial value in the vessel has been put upon it by Mr. Davis, and in American waters. It is for the purpose of furnishing some craft to ply around among the islands, and to give pleasure to the gentleman from New York, and others, when they go there. Mr. Davis desires an American registry only that he may have it more completely under his own control. The vessel approaches somewhat, though not entirely, to the class of pleasure-yachts. As it has been owned some years by an American, as it has been rebuilt by an American, of American materials, the committee thought there was no objection to the request in this case, and that in fact there was a seeming propriety in granting an American register. In that view of the case, with all the strictness which the committee hold now as in former days, the committee have reported in favor of this bill.

Mr. POTTER. I am very sure that I shall never come to any general agreement with my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] about legislation; for I believe it should be conducted by rule, while he believes that it should be conducted by favor. Now, that "the gentleman from New York" may be able, as he suggests, to go to these islands of the Saint Lawrence and enjoy a sail there in this vessel, is to my mind no reason whatever for passing this bill.

Mr. CONGER. Is it not more pleasure to the gentleman to see the stars and stripes rather than the red cross on a vessel?

Mr. POTTER. Yes; but it is a higher pleasure to see the law administered equally for all men, without partiality and without distinction. I am in favor of having free ships, of course accompanied, as my colleague [Mr. WOOD] suggests, with free material for shipbuilding; otherwise free ships would be putting the American builder at a disadvantage. But so long as the laws impose a duty on ships, as they do upon silks, why should one man be allowed to bring in a ship free of duty, when the rest of us are not allowed to do so? That is all there is of this bill.

Here is a vessel, worth more or less, built in Great Britain, not allowed American registry under our laws, excluded from participation in our commerce. The man who owns her comes here and asks, through the Committee on Commerce, that she shall be given a special license to be treated as an American vessel. The general policy of opening our ports to foreign-built vessels I shall be ready to meet whenever it is proposed. But just so long as we put the vessels built in foreign countries at a disadvantage, no man should be allowed to bring in a foreign-built vessel for his own benefit alone, when every one else is excluded from that privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. Is there not a general law by which foreign vessels wrecked and rebuilt in this country may obtain a license from the Treasury?

Mr. WHEELER. This is not such a case; this is not a wrecked vessel.

Mr. KELLEY. Exactly; it is not a wrecked vessel. There is a general law on the subject, to which I think we had better adhere.

Mr. POTTER. That is it exactly.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not prepared this morning, nor do I think this the time or occasion, to discuss the question of free trade in ships or anything else. Unless Congress is to depart from a policy which it has observed for twenty years past, then this bill should pass. It is the case of a vessel originally British built; but, as the chairman of the sub-committee, [Mr. CONGER,] who had this bill in charge, informs the House, it has been repaired to at least three-quarters of its value. In such a case, even though the vessel has not been wrecked, we have always been in the habit of granting an American register.

Mr. POTTER. Always in the habit of granting an American register in such cases?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know any precedent to the contrary since I have been in Congress. In this very Congress we have passed several such bills; we passed one last Friday. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the following memorials, and moved that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims:

A memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Utah Territory, praying for an appropriation to pay for Indian depredations and expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities; and Petitions of commanders and masters of United States naval vessels, and others, for allowing Howl Colby compensation for assistance rendered shipmasters in the service of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPELLER WILLIAM M. TWEED.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo, owned by the Union Steamboat Company, a corporation of the State of New York, to Newburgh, and to grant said vessel proper marine papers in said name.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suggest whether this bill ought to pass without the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] being heard? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. It had been supposed that possibly this bill might be in conflict with the law which prohibits the registry of two vessels of the same name in the same district. I will state, therefore, that I have received a telegram from the collector of the district of Buffalo, stating that there is no steamer of the name of Newburgh already registered in that district. Therefore there is no objection on that score to this change of name. I ask the Clerk to read a passage which I have marked in the petition of the Union Steamboat Company, who own this propeller.

The Clerk read as follows:

In pursuance of such lawful business, the said company is the owner and manager of a certain steamboat known as the William M. Tweed, which said steamboat is duly enrolled according to the laws of the United States relating to the enrollment of vessels navigating its waters. Her enrollment is dated April 14, 1873, a copy of which, for the better description and identification of said steamboat, is annexed to and made part of this petition.

Mr. CONGER. This is a steamer of about twelve hundred tons, navigating the upper lakes. It is owned by the Union Steamboat Company, who have petitioned for a change of its name for reasons they have assigned. I would yield to my friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] to speak on this subject, but that I have promised to yield to my other friend from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the remark made by my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] "had reference to an allusion" made by my gallant friend from Kentucky [Mr. CROSSLAND] some time since. Several years ago I introduced a bill here to change the name of a vessel from Industry to William M. Tweed. That bill never passed, although this House was republican then, as it is now; and, considering the whole case, that is strange.

But, Mr. Speaker, without any personal allusions, I think it may be a wise thing, commercially considered, to change the name of this vessel. There are reasons, political and otherwise, why the name of William M. Tweed should not be upon any of our national vessels. The Federal Administration is so sensitive and so much reproached by such denomination! The influence which Mr. Tweed once exercised in the city of New York and in the party to which I belong, is now as extinct as the dodo. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] knows what bird that is. [Laughter.] Our party in New York City, since Mr. Tweed's absence from politics, has been entirely reformed and reinvigorated. I only wish the party of the gentleman from Michigan would take the same pains and exercise the same Roman virtue to reform itself as the democratic party of the city of New York. It is thought that Mr. Tweed did our party harm. I presume that is the reason why the allusions to myself in this connection seem so significant to the ignorant. One bad man can kill a party. Will my friends remember that. Was it not Josh Billings who remarked that "one hornet, if he felt well, could break up a whole camp-meeting?" [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. If no further remarks on this subject are desired, I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report in each case ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 393) granting a pension to Rosanna Quinn;

A bill (H. R. No. 1305) granting a pension to E. Caroline Webster, widow of Lucius H. Webster;

A bill (H. R. No. 1907) granting a pension to Henry B. Havens, late a private of Company K, Twelfth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1835) granting a pension to Mary A. Lowe.

A. KENNEDY.

Mr. RUSK, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of A. Kennedy, of Company H, Third West Virginia Cavalry; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

MARY S. MOORE.

Mr. RUSK also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Samuel Moore and Mary S. Moore, asking that a pension be granted to Mary S. Moore; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

LYDIA BENJAMIN.

Mr. RUSK also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Lydia Benjamin, widow of David Benjamin; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSANNA BENNETT.

Mr. WALLACE, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 1414) granting a pension to Susanna Bennett; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN B. MILLER.

Mr. WALLACE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2351) granting a pension to John B. Miller; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

Mr. BARRY, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, bills of the following titles; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 196) granting a pension to Peter J. Cratzer; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1719) granting a pension to Ezra H. Foster.

MAGDALENA DOCKS.

Mr. MCJUNKIN, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2116) for the relief of Magdalena Docks; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

LEWIS HINELY.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2352) granting a pension to Lewis Hinely; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ZEBINA F. RAWSON.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1692) for the relief of Zebina F. Rawson, of Shelby County, Missouri; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM MAY, SR.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the petition of William May, sr., of Spencer County, Indiana, praying for increase of pension to his insane son; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LUCY ANN CUMMINGS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2335) granting a pension to Lucy Ann Cummings; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ADELAIDE ADAMS.

Mr. O'BRIEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely on the petition of Mrs. Adelaide Adams, widow of George Adams, United States Navy; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. EMILY L. SLAUGHTER.

Mr. O'BRIEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2354) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily L. Slaughter, widow of Albert G. Slaughter, commander in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANN R. VOORHEES.

Mr. O'BRIEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2355) granting a pension to Ann R. Voorhees, widow of P. F. Voorhees, late captain United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SEMINOLE INDIANS.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be taken up.

There was no objection.

Mr. AVERILL. I move non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate, for the purpose of getting a committee of conference.

The amendment of the Senate was read as follows:

In line 17 of the bill strike out "seventy-five hundred" and insert "five thousand."

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to know in what connection that amendment comes.

Mr. AVERILL. It simply reduces the appropriation from $7,500 to $5,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is, will the House concur or non-concur?

Mr. AVERILL. I move non-concurrence, and that the House ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. HOLMAN. In what connection does the amendment come?

Mr. AVERILL. This $7,500 was a portion of the annuity set apart by the bill as an educational fund. The Senate has seen fit to reduce it to $5,000. It has been considered again by the committee, and the committee adhere to their bill. I move non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in, and a committee of conference was requested on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2224) making an appropriation to pay the operators of the Government telegraph connecting the Departments with the two Houses of Congress; and

An act (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher.

ABOLITION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith replies from the several Departments, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th of January last, requesting a list of all expenses incurred by the various Departments for transportation of any matter which before the abolition of the franking privilege was carried in the mails.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1874.

The message and the accompanying documents were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STONE for eight days, to Mr. LAMISON indefinitely, and to Mr. RAY for two weeks.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. SPEER. I offer the following resolution, which I have modified to meet the suggestions of several gentlemen.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House, at his earliest convenience, the names and post-office address of all the pension agents in the service of the Government, with the number of pensioners paid by each for the quarter ending on the 4th day of December, 1873, and with a statement of the salary, fees, and emoluments received by each agent for the last year; also, the number of pensioners, manner and cost of payment prior to the rebellion; also, the cost of payment prior to the act of 1870 changing the salaries of agents and changing the mode of payment.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I think that information is already before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RUSK. I think we have that information before us.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I think the Military Committee have that information, and authority was given to have three thousand copies of the report for the reduction of the Army printed.

Mr. SPEER. It will be necessary, when we come to consider the amendment to the pension bill reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RUSK. I shall insist that shall go to the committee or I will object.

Mr. SPEER. I will withdraw the resolution, and offer it under a suspension of the rules on Monday next.

ARMY REGISTER AND NATIONAL FLAGS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I desire to have the resolution read and to make a single remark thereon.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, in the year 1874:

Resolve rescinding and annulling a resolution passed December 18, in the year 1872, relating to Army register and national flags.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in General Court assembled, That the resolution passed on the 18th day of December, 1872, at the extra session of the Legislature of that year, relating to a bill introduced in the Senate of the United States concerning the Army register and regimental colors of the United States, be, and hereby is, rescinded and annulled.

SENATE, February 11, 1874.

Passed. Sent down for concurrence.

S. N. GIFFORD, Clerk.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 13, 1874.

Concurred.

GEORGE A. MARDEN, Clerk.

SECRETARY'S DEPARTMENT,
Boston, March 3, 1874.

A true copy of the original resolve.
Attest:

OLIVER WARNER,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts, referring to the somewhat famous bill of Mr. SUMNER, to strike out the names of the battles of the rebellion from the Army Register and national flags, has been sent to me by the governor of the State, I assume for the purpose of presenting it to the House and having it read. I have discharged that duty. What it refers to is something I should not have done myself. I should myself neither have presented the bill, nor censured anybody for presenting it. Every member of either House of Congress has the constitutional right to present anything to his branch of the Government without being called to account for it in any other place. Therefore, as I do not believe in the doctrine of instructions or resolutions of State Legislatures about the conduct of members of Congress, I take pleasure in doing this, my duty, in presenting the resolution to the House.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the course now pursued by his Department in addressing to the Speaker communications intended for the consideration of any of the committees of the House; which was referred to the Committee on Rules, and ordered to be printed.

MAJOR HENRY PRINCE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the case of Major Henry Prince, paymaster United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NEW MEXICO PRIVATE LAND CLAIM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the New Mexico private land claim No. 72; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF HARLEM RIVER, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of survey of Harlem River, Raritan River, Crow Shoals, and Old House Channel to main channel to Pamlico Sound, entrance to Matagorda Bay, and San Antonio Creek; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SANBORN CONTRACT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional papers in relation to the Sanborn contract; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER. I hold in my hand correspondence relative to that matter between District-Attorney Tenney and the Secretary of the Treasury. This correspondence was furnished to me on my application to the Secretary. I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, in connection with the communication just referred to that committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

G. L. MALONEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the claim of G. L. Maloney, late first lieutenant Company C, Sixth Tennessee Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES H. BAKER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the petition of Helen M. Barnard, in relation to charges against James H. Baker, Commissioner of Pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. NIBLACK in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bills, in their order, upon the Private Calendar.

R. W. CLARKE.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont.

The bill was read. It directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit to R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $1,312.87, being the amount of postage-stamps and postal money-order funds stolen from the safe of said post-office by burglars on the 24th day of November, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

DR. EDWARD JARVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Dr. Edward Jarvis the sum of $1,500, in full for his services in the preparation of the United States census for 1850.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

WILLARD DAVIS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The bill immediately preceding the point where we commenced this morning, (H. R. No. 1956,) for the relief of Willard Davis, was passed over the other day on the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, not because he had any objection to the bill, but because there was a long report, and he did not want to have it read. I hope there will be no objection to taking it up now.

No objection was made; and the bill (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis was taken up for consideration.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to pass to the credit of Willard Davis, late collector in the second and fifth collection districts of Kentucky, the sum of $14,338.33.

The report was read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 571) for the relief of Willard Davis, present the following report:

The claimant, Willard Davis, was, from the 18th day of April, 1863, until the 14th day of October, 1864, collector of internal revenue for the second district of the State of Kentucky. Said district comprised thirty counties and nearly one-third of said State; and said Davis collected therein and paid into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $175,673.30. Your committee also find that, upon a reorganization of said State into collection districts, said Davis was internal-revenue collector in the fifth district in said State from October 15, 1864, to April 28, 1866; that said fifth district comprised twenty-nine counties; and that said Davis collected therein $1,031,754.53. Both of said districts were in the southeast part of said State, and bordered upon Tennessee and Virginia, and during the late war were often overrun by lawless bands of guerrillas; and said collector was often obliged to pack up and remove his official papers belonging to his said office, for the purpose of securing them against loss and destruction. The disturbed and dangerous condition of that section of country during the period of the war, while Mr. Davis was acting as collector, is fully shown by the testimony of a large number of respectable and intelligent witnesses. Among these is General S. G. Burbridge, who for a long time commanded the Union forces in that State. In his testimony before the committee he states that he assumed command of the Department of Kentucky in the early part of the year 1864, with headquarters at Lexington; that during his administration of the military affairs of the State there were frequent invasions of the eastern and southeastern portions of the State by rebel troops, and guerrilla raids were almost constantly occurring; that he never had at his command sufficient troops to protect the State from such invasions and raids, and that the old second and fifth districts were often overrun by guerrillas and maranders. He states that when he assumed such command he found said Collector Davis at Richmond, in said fifth district, using his best endeavors to collect the internal-revenue taxes due the Government; that said Davis frequently applied to him for troops to enable said collector and his deputies to go to different parts of his district, and that he was never able to comply with the request but on one occasion, for the want of troops; that for miles around Richmond, in said district, and in all the mountainous portions of said district, neither said collector nor his deputies were safe alone; that owing to said disturbed and dangerous condition of the country said collector was obliged to pay extra compensation to his deputies, and was also obliged, at great expense, to hire guards to accompany him and them in their trips to the different parts of the district. General Burbridge further states that he is only surprised to learn that so much of the revenue was collected by said collector in the midst of such constant and great dangers, and that simple justice to said collector requires that the Government should not only relieve him from any uncollected taxes charged against him, "but that he should be reimbursed for moneys paid out, and have, in addition, reasonable compensation for his services so well and faithfully performed at a time when there was no law or protection in his district."

Said collector claims in his petition the sum of $20,633.10 as a proper allowance to be made to him by Congress in the settlement of his accounts with the Internal-Revenue Department. The committee have rejected all the said claim except the following:

He claims $150, taken from his deputy by guerrillas.

For money paid out in the employment of necessary guards to enable him and his deputies to discharge the duties of their respective offices, $1,500.

For uncollected taxes, charged against him in the Internal-Revenue Department, the lists for which were destroyed by guerrillas, without any fault upon the part of said collector, the sum of $7,613.33.

For additional compensation as collector in said second and fifth districts, $8.000.

For expenses necessarily incurred in sending a messenger to the assessor's office, distant one hundred and fifty miles, $75.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a letter addressed to the chairman of this committee, referring to the item in reference to the destruction of the collection-lists, says: "Referring to your letter of the 31st instant, relative to item 10 in the claim for relief of Willard Davis, late collector second and fifth districts of Kentucky, I have the honor to say that this office is satisfied that he should receive credit for the $7,613.33 referred to therein, being amount of taxes unaccounted for, covered by lists alleged to have been destroyed by rebel raiders." It also appears in proof by several witnesses that the guerrillas got possession of the papers and lists of said collector and destroyed them.

In a letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, addressed to the committee, in reference to the item for compensation, that officer says: "This office cannot approve this item for the full amount thereof, but does indorse it to the amount of $5,000, as that sum, added to the amounts credited and allowed him, will insure to Collector Davis a net compensation of about $5,000 per annum, not an excessive amount when due consideration is given to the hardships and difficulties incident to the discharge of the duties of the collector, at a time when his district was infested with guerrillas and other lawless persons, who rendered the transaction of all business by agents of the United States, in its behalf, a matter of great personal peril, and also rendered it necessary to incur many expenses which could not be considered by the Department as a legal credit to the collector. Mr. Davis was considered to be an honest and efficient officer, who, by misfortune resulting from the peculiar situation of affairs referred to above, rather than from any fault or lack of diligence on his part, became involved in his accounts with the Government, and he is believed to be entitled to generous treatment by Congress."

The first and last items above mentioned are fully sustained by the evidence before the committee, and the committee are of opinion that the charge of $1,500 is, under all the circumstances, reasonable and just. The evidence in this case is very voluminous, and shows beyond question that the said collector was an honest, capable, and faithful officer.

In view of all the facts, your committee recommend that said collector be allowed the sum of $14,338.33, and for that purpose recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for said bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

OLIVER P. MASON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 763) for the relief of Oliver P. Mason.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $787.50 for the payment to Oliver P. Mason, for services rendered as assistant provost-marshal in the Department of Kansas; and the proper officers of the War and Treasury Departments are hereby authorized to pay the said sum to the said Oliver P. Mason or his legal representatives.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 763) for the relief of Oliver P. Mason, having considered the same, report:

This bill appropriates the sum of $787.50 for military service rendered by the claimant, under the following circumstances:

In 1864 it was deemed necessary by the general commanding the Department of Kansas to appoint an assistant provost-marshal for duty at Nebraska City, for the apprehension of such fugitives from courts-martial and deserters from the draft for military service, as might seek obscurity and safety from military observation and arrest in that remote locality. There was no other authority for this appointment than military rule and necessity, as the claimant was a civilian, and few troops, if any, had post at Nebraska City. The appropriation act, approved July 9, 1863, (section 2,) prohibited the payment of money from the Treasury to any person acting or assuming to act as an officer, civil, military, or naval, as salary in office, which office was not authorized by some previously existing law, unless such office should be subsequently sanctioned by law.

But the claimant was a citizen of high character and reputation, was well versed in the laws, competent to administer criminal and military law, and was lately the chief justice of the State of Nebraska. He was thought to be the best person for that duty, and his administration was sanctioned by his superior officers and by the War Department. Through his instrumentality, there were arrested and returned to the military authorities at Leavenworth and Saint Louis many desperate criminals, who had killed Union men and officers in Kansas and Missouri. He arrested and brought to justice the murderers of a deputy United States marshal in Iowa, who was killed while executing the duties of his office. He had draft-deserters and bounty-jumpers returned to Kentucky and Ohio, and these services were performed at his own expense from the 22d July, 1864, to January 31, 1865.

His accounts were presented to the Quartermaster's Department, which declined to pay them, and were referred to the Adjutant-General at a period so late that the "provost-fund" of that officer was exhausted.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JULIUS GRIESENBECK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas.

The bill was read. It instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas, the sum of $212.50, which shall be in full for his claim for supplies furnished by him for a detachment of the United States cavalry, under command of Sergeant Von Urick, in the service of the United States, at Waco, Texas, in the year 1868.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas, respectfully report:

That the claim is for supplies furnished and provided by the claimant in the year 1868, for a detachment of United States cavalry, under command of Sergeant Van Urick, at Waco, in Texas, in the service of the United States. The supplies consisted of corn, hay, horseshoeing, wagon repairs, medical attendance, and coffin furnished for a soldier injured by being run over with a transport wagon, from which injury he died, and for other items of supplies. The claim and account is fully and satisfactorily shown, as well by the affidavits of the claimant and of one of the soldiers, Hugh Marrion, belonging to said detachment, as also by the receipts and vouchers of Sergeant Van Urick, in command, given at the time. The prices and values charged appear to be reasonable. The claim amounts in the whole to the sum of $212.50. The claimant having in good faith furnished the supplies on request of the officer in command, and not having received pay therefor, the committee are of the opinion that compensation should be made to him, and they report the accompanying bill for his relief, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to inquire, for I do not quite understand the report, why the proper officers of the regiment did not make payment of this money. This occurred in 1868, I understand.

Mr. HAMILTON. There was no commissioned officer to receive the articles furnished. It was a detachment of cavalry under the command of a sergeant who receipted for the supplies, and they are all proven by affidavits and by the non-commissioned officer in command.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, that the only trouble about it was the fact this was a non-commissioned officer.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF STEAMER BIENVILLE.

Mr. LAMISON. I ask the committee to indulge me by taking up, out of their order, three bills, which I reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have received telegrams announcing illness in my family, and I am going home to-day, having bought my through tickets; but if I am detained here until those bills come up, I shall be unable to get away.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the bills will be taken up out of their order.

The first bill called up by Mr. LAMISON was the bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and pay to such persons as were the officers and composed the crew of the United States steamer Bienville, on the 5th day of August, 1864, a sum equal to that to which the officers and crew of said steamer would have been entitled to receive as prize-money had the name of said steamer been inserted in the list of the vessels entitled to share in the captures made in the bay of Mobile on said 5th day of August, 1864, the name of said vessel having been accidentally omitted from said list; said sum to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and distributed as prize-money.

Mr. LAMISON. I desire to make a brief statement to the House in regard to that bill, inasmuch as there is no report accompanying it.

The CHAIRMAN. All that can be done is to read the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is not objection day.

The CHAIRMAN. The first and fourth Fridays of the month are objection days. Last Friday was the fourth Friday in February, and therefore was objection day, and this is the first Friday in March, and is also objection day.

Mr. LAMISON. This is a claim for prize-money on the part of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville, growing out of the engagement in Mobile Bay in 1864.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. LAMISON. About $20,000. The facts in the case are briefly these: The steamer Bienville was placed on the outside of the bar at Mobile, under the command of Lieutenant Commander Howison. He had a signal officer on board his ship, and he was the nearest of the outside fleet to the bar. He took part in the engagement, having lost his mast, which was shot away, one man being killed and three wounded. When the prize-list came to be made up for the capture of the rebel ram Tennessee, and other rebel vessels taken by the fleet at Mobile, Commander Howison presented his prize-claim in the usual way to the admiral commanding—Admiral Farragut; but by some fatality or other it appears that his claim was never forwarded to the prize-court which convened in New Orleans. All the other vessels that were stationed on the outside of the harbor received their prize-money; they were all included in the adjudication of the court at New Orleans. Captain Howison made his application to the Department for the purpose of ascertaining why his claim had not been acted on, and the Department referred him to the court at New Orleans. Finally he made application to Admiral Farragut, for the reason that it deprived him and his officers and crew of the prize-money to which they were entitled.

Mr. FORT. I understand that nobody is objecting to this bill at all.

Mr. LAMISON. I desire to make a brief statement, for the reason that there is no report in full. Admiral Farragut replied as follows:

NEW YORK, February 18, 1869.

DEAR SIR: Having just learned from the Navy Department that the Bienville, commanded by you in the attack on the forts at Mobile, Alabama, in 1864, was not included in the decree setting forth the vessels entitled to a share in prize-money, I take pleasure in stating that your vessel was one of the outside fleet, in full sight of action, afterward conveyed the prisoners from Fort Morgan to New Orleans, and is as much entitled to a share in the prize-money as any of the outside fleet, consisting of the Pembina, Pinald, Sebago, Tennessee, and Genesee.

I am, very truly, yours,

D. G. FARRAGUT,
Admiral.

Lieutenant Commander HOWISON.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMISON] if the effect of passing this bill will not be to give to these officers prize-money, when all the prize-money for all the vessels engaged in the battle was distributed among these other vessels, giving them in fact a greater share than they were entitled to.

Mr. LAMISON. The effect of passing this bill is to pay these officers the amount of prize-money to which they are entitled.

Mr. HOLMAN. In adjudicating this money in the district court of Louisiana, was not the whole amount that all these vessels were entitled to receive distributed among the other vessels?

Mr. LAMISON. Precisely.

Mr. HOLMAN. So that the effect of passing this bill is to give an additional sum over and above the amount that was awarded by the district court of Louisiana.

Mr. LAMISON. Not at all. The effect is to pay out of the money now in the Treasury derived from the sale of prizes the share which these officers would have received if their claim had come properly before the court.

The amendment was to strike out the words "any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and distributed as prize-money;" and to insert in lieu the words "the naval-pension fund."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

MARY C. BELL.

Mr. LAMISON. The next bill I desire to have now considered is the bill (H. R. No. 2094½) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Bell.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary C. Bell, dependent mother of David N. Bell, late an ensign in the United States Navy, at the rate of fifteen dollars per month from and after the passage of the act; the pension certificate now held by the said Mary C. Bell to be given up, surrendered, and canceled from and after the time the act shall take effect.

Mr. LAMISON. I will state briefly the facts in this case. Mary C. Bell is the mother of Daniel N. Bell, who was a midshipman in the United States Navy. He was put on board the Dakota at Philadelphia in 1865, and because of exposure while engaged in assisting to fit out the vessel during that winter, one of the coldest on record, he contracted bronchitis. He sailed for Madeira, and while there became very much prostrated. He afterward recovered, I may say completely, and having been examined by the surgeon, received a commission as ensign. His mother presented her claim for a pension to the Pension Bureau, and was awarded a pension of ten dollars a month—the pension of a midshipman. The committee think she should receive the pension of an ensign, and have reported this bill to increase her pension five dollars a month.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

MARY SWIFT.

Mr, LAMISON. The next bill which I wish considered is the bill

(H. R. No. 52) granting an annuity to Mary Swift, daughter of Thomas Truxton, deceased, late commodore in the United States Navy.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary Swift, daughter of Thomas Truxton, deceased, late commodore in the United States Navy, on the pension-roll, and allow her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month, to be paid as now provided by law in such cases.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. LAMISON. This completes the list of bills which I desire to have considered; and I again thank the committee for its courtesy in consenting that they should be taken up out of their order.

SURETIES OF JESSE J. SIMKINS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to take up and consider the bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia. That bill was passed over last week during my absence.

The bill, which was read, releases and discharges the sureties of Jesse J. Simkins, deceased, late collector and public depositary at the port of Norfolk, Virginia, from a judgment rendered in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia against said sureties and in favor of the United States of America, on the 10th day of January, 1871.

The amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall affect the just claim of the United States to the money specially deposited in the treasury of the State of Virginia by said Simkins to the use of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The papers in this case are voluminous; I think I can state the facts precisely. Jesse J. Simkins, now dead, was collector at Norfolk, Virginia, at the breaking out of the war of the rebellion. He had settled up his accounts to the 1st of April, according to the law and the regulations of the Treasury Department. On the 19th of April the town of Norfolk was taken possession of by the confederate forces. Mr. Simkins then had money in his hands belonging to the United States. The custom-house at Norfolk was made the headquarters of the confederate general, Huger. General Huger gave Mr. Simkins an order to turn this money over to him. Mr. Simkins asked his sureties what he should do, and they asked General Huger to allow them to consult the authorities at Richmond. General Huger said that if they would give him their word of honor that the money should not be disposed of in any way except under the orders of the authorities at Richmond he would wait. Thereupon they went to Richmond and made an arrangement with the governor of the State of Virginia to make a special deposit of this money in the treasury of the State of Virginia, where it now is. The confederate authorities ordered Mr. Simkins, further, to deposit all moneys that should come to him in any way from customs in the treasury of the State of Virginia, which he did, until an amount in the neighborhood of $21,000 was so deposited.

During the war I believe he died. After the war the United States called upon his sureties to pay that money which had been deposited in the treasury of the State of Virginia. His sureties called upon the State; but the State refused to give any relief. A suit was brought, the question being whether an unauthorized act of the public enemy would release the contract of the sureties. The court decided that it would not; that they must be held responsible. Thereupon we passed, a year or two ago, a bill for the relief of Mr. Simkins's sureties, by giving him credit for the amount, provided the State of Virginia would pass it over, and authorizing the Attorney-General to call on the State for that money. The State of Virginia, when the demand was made upon it, submitted the question to its attorney-general, who decided that as the constitution of the State made invalid all claims arising out of the war of the rebellion, this was a claim arising in that way, and that the State could not pay it.

Mr. Simkins did the very best he could, under the circumstances, to defend the interests of the United States and to protect his sureties. He acted under a vis major. A direct order would have taken the money away from him if he had not placed it in the treasury of the State to protect himself. General Huger, who at that time had his headquarters in the custom-house there, had entire control of that money whenever he chose to take it. It was only the endeavor of Mr. Simkins and his sureties to protect themselves and the interests of the United States that caused the money to be paid into the treasury of the State.

These facts now appearing from the documents sent to us by the Attorney-General, the Committee on the Judiciary (unanimously I believe) agreed that it was but right that Mr. Simkins's sureties should be discharged, and that the United States should look for their money where it is on deposit. We have inserted in the bill a provision that this legislation shall not invalidate any claim which the United States may have upon the State of Virginia. This is the whole case from beginning to end.

Mr. POTTER. When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] spoke of an arrangement made by Mr. Simkins with the authorities at Richmond, I presume the gentleman did not mean the confederate authorities, but the legally authorized government of the State.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The State government of Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. I observe that the law passed by the last Congress provides that—

The sureties of the said Jesse J. Simkins, upon his bond as collector and public depositary in said Norfolk, shall, upon the payment of said moneys by the State of Virginia and the receipt thereof by the United States be released and discharged from liability on said bonds to the United States to the extent of the moneys so received by the United States and no further.

I infer from this provision that it was understood the amount of money deposited by this collector in the treasury of Virginia was not a sum equal to the Government's claim against him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The clause which the gentleman has just read was introduced into that act ex majore cautela—from greater caution. The amount in dispute is exactly the amount that went into the treasury of Virginia. This appears clearly from the statement of the Attorney-General, and the facts elicited in the suit. There was no defalcation. Mr. Simpkins had settled his accounts up to April 1, 1861. That appeared clearly before our committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this suit was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. And appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; no appeal was taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. The circuit court held, as I understand, that the payment of this money into the treasury of Virginia by compulsion of the confederate authorities did not release the sureties.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; the decision was that the payment of this money into the treasury of Virginia in order to escape the taking of it by the military authorities of the confederacy was no answer to a suit on the bond.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did it not appear in that action that this money was voluntarily paid by this collector?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It was not voluntarily paid in the way I have stated; the collector placed it voluntarily in the treasury of Virginia, instead of having it taken away involuntarily.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] whether it is not a fact fully proven to the satisfaction of every member of the Judiciary Committee, and every other gentleman who has examined the case, that Mr. Simpkins had presented to him this alternative: either to have the money taken from him by military force and devoted to the confederate service, or to pay it into the treasury of Virginia, taking the chance of the Government of the United States recovering it afterward.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That was the exact alternative.

Mr. POTTER. If the State constitution had not been altered since the war, this money would, as I understand, have been recovered. The only difficulty is that the State treasurer, under the provisions of the present constitution, is disabled from paying the debt; not that the debt has been repudiated by the State.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is the fact.

Mr. HOLMAN. I apprehend that the effect of this bill may be to repeal the first section of the act passed by the last Congress; and I would suggest the insertion of a provision that nothing in this bill shall be understood as repealing the first section of that act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill already contains a provision that it shall not affect the claim of the United States against the State of Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the act of the last Congress makes it the duty of the Attorney-General to demand and receive from the treasurer of the State this money.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That requirement is not interfered with by this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I do not insist on my suggestion.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JAMES LILLIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2088) for the relief of James Lillie, postmaster at Lisbonville, Ray County, Missouri.

The bill was read. It directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit, in the account of James Lillie as postmaster at Lisbonville, Ray County, Missouri, the sum of $22.26, being the value of stamps and stamped envelopes destroyed by fire in said post-office on the 19th day of January, 1873, without negligence on the part of said postmaster.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount of this claim is so small—twenty-two dollars—that its very modesty ought to commend it to the House.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JOHN DOLD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 764) for the relief of John Dold.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Dold the sum of $1,525.83 in lieu of check numbered A, 7531, on the United States depositary, dated the 26th day of February, 1872, payable to the order of said John Dold, and signed by A. J. McGonigle, acting quartermaster United States Army; which said check, it is claimed, has been lost, and was never received by the said John Dold; provided that before the payment authorized the said John Dold shall execute a bond of indemnity to the United States, with sufficient sureties, against the claim of the payee in said draft.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM CHESTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 692) for the relief of William Chester.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the proper accounting officer of the Post-Office Department to credit William Chester, postmaster at Knobnoster, Johnson County, Missouri, with the sum of $329.85, on his account as postmaster, as aforesaid, with said Department, said sum being the amount of postage-stamps and postal money stolen from said post-office on the 11th day of May, 1872, by the burglarious entry of the said building in which said office was kept.

The report was read, as follows:

William Chester has been postmaster at Knobnoster, Missouri, since the year 1861. The post-office was entered on the night of the 11th of May, 1872, by burglars, and robbed of postage-stamps to the value of $322, and of money to the amount of eight dollars, and of two registered letters containing $7.85.

The building in which the post office was then and is now kept is a large and substantially built brick, with a basement underneath. The burglars entered the building through a window between six and seven feet from the ground, and afterward forced the lock attached to the door of the office proper, which is located inside of said large brick building, which lock, as it appears from the testimony of Mr. Chester, was in good condition and properly locked when he left the office the evening before the robbery.

The testimony in the case is very strong that Mr. Chester is an upright and honorable man; and that the robbery was committed without any neglect or fault of his. That is the distinct opinion of the special agent who examined the case soon after the robbery was committed, as will appear by a copy of his report hereto attached.

On inquiry at the Post-Office Department we find the probable amount of postage-stamps that Mr. Chester should have had on hand on the 11th of May, 1872, was $333.06. The actual amount, as Mr. Chester claims, was $322.

As it appears that Mr. Chester was obliged to pay or make good the sum of $7.85 which was inclosed in the registered letters, it seems to the committee that he is as justly entitled to that amount as to the value of the stamps which were stolen. As to the eight dollars in money, as it does not distinctly appear from the evidence that it was received for stamps, and as the committee feel great reluctance to recommend the repayment of money so stolen, we do not recommend its payment. Believing the stamps and the money in the registered letters should be refunded, we recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for the bill referred to the committee.

SAINT LOUIS, MO., July 20, 1872.

SIR: Please find inclosed Department case 5172, robbery of the Knobnoster, Johnson County, post-office. I gave this case a personal investigation, as I considered the case an important one. The amount of stamps lost is large, and Mr. William Chester, the postmaster, is an honest old man, (a cripple,) and is a true friend of the republican party. The post-office was kept in Mr. Cordell's drug-store, and was entered (it is supposed) on Sunday morning early, by breaking a pane of glass. The office had no safe, and it was easy work to steal everything the thief wanted. The party suspected is one Thomas Emerson, a fellow about twenty-two years of age, a barber by occupation. Emerson left on Monday, May 13, and went to Saint Louis, Missouri, then to Holden, and now is in Kansas City. Emerson has been watched, but up to date no convicting evidence has been found against him. Two registered letters were rifled on the night of the robbery—No. 23, addressed to Alexander Dixon, Republican, Ohio, and No. 24, to the Sun office, New York; one contained $6.85, and the other one dollar; both letters in package No. 23. The stamps stolen amounted to about $322, and the small change in the till was about eight dollars, making in all a loss of $337.85. As the law does not relieve a postmaster of the responsibility for losses by burglary, except by special acts of Congress, I requested Mr. Chester to make good all the losses, which he did. I have no further need of the case. Should I succeed in getting the thief, I can get the papers again. Case respectfully returned.

Yours, very respectfully,

F. W. SCHAURTE,
Special Agent.

CHARLES COCHRAN, Jr., Esq.,
Superintendent Mail Depredations, P. O. D.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1874.

SIR: Yours of the 26th instant, asking certain information in regard to the alleged robbery of the post-office at Knobnoster, Missouri, on the 11th of May, 1872, is received. In reply, I have the honor—

1st. To inclose a copy of a report on file in the Department of an investigation of the case made by Special Agent Schaurte.

2d. To submit the following estimate of postage-stamps and stamped envelopes on hand:

Postage-stamps and stamped envelopes on hand March 31, 1872, as per quarterly returns to the Auditor	$464 67
Deduct estimated sales for forty-one days, (average daily sales for six months ending March 31, 1872, being $3.21)	131 61
Gives probable amount on hand May 11, 1872	333 06

It will be observed that the loss of stamps is given by Mr. Schaurte as $322.

3d. To state that an estimate gives $101.70 as the probable amount of funds in the hands of the postmaster and belonging to the United States. Mr. Schaurte, however, gives the money loss at only $8.

4th. To state that the post-office at Knobnoster is not a money-order office.

Very respectfully, &c.,

E. W. BARBER,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. Q. SMITH,
Of Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN BRENNAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 650) for the relief of John Brennan.

The bill, which was read, provides that John Brennan shall be allowed the sum of $643, for disbursements made by him in compensating assistant janitors in the United States court-house and post-office at Indianapolis, Indiana, under authority from the United States marshal.

The report was read, as follows:

This is a claim of John Brennan, who was employed as a janitor in the United States post-office and court-house at Indianapolis, Indiana, for reimbursement for moneys paid by him to assistants in the years 1867 and 1868. The bill has been regularly presented to the Treasury Department and payment refused. A special act is asked.

The amount of the claim is $643.19.

The evidence of the claimant in support of the bill is the certificate of General Benjamin Spooner, the United States marshal of Indiana, who certifies "that he believes that the account is correct and just; that the services were rendered as stated, and were necessary for the public service."

General Spooner is the successor of Colonel D. G. Rose, who, as marshal of the United States, directed Brennan to employ assistance in the first instance. He was afterward continued in service during Spooner's term of service, and the most of the money paid out during that time. The evidence of General Spooner as to the rendition of the services and their value is conclusive.

Brennan swears to his own account, his employment, and the payments made to his assistants,

His statement is corroborated by William Lawlor; he testifies as to payments made to his assistants.

The testimony of E. P. Thompson, late assistant postmaster at Indianapolis, shows that the services were rendered, and that Brennan has not been paid.

The official statement of Hon. George S. Boutwell, Secretary of the Treasury, says that "it appears that the services charged were actually rendered, and that the prices named in the bill are reasonable, but under existing law the bill cannot be paid from any appropriation under the control of this Department, and it would be necessary to have a special appropriation for its payment." The Secretary puts it as his conclusion "that the services charged were actually rendered, and that the prices named in the bill are reasonable."

This claim is just; the money has been paid; the proof is conclusive, and the Government should reimburse Brennan for the amounts paid by him as hire for help as janitor. We recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES COATS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of James Coats, of Jackson, Mississippi.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James Coats, of Jackson, Mississippi, the sum of $986.70, in full for labor and repairs, and materials and furniture, furnished to the United States court-house at Jackson, Mississippi.

The report was read, as follows:

On the 23d day of March, 1871, Mr. Coats entered into a contract with Michael Shaughnessy, United States marshal for the southern district of Mississippi, to repair and fit up the city-hall at Jackson, Mississippi, or that part of it used by the United States Government for the United States district-court room and offices. The work was done in accordance with plans of Joseph Willis, architect for the State, and for the sum of $2,535. Upon the removal of the carpet it was found to be so full of vermin as to be unfit for further use. Some extra painting and work upon the doors and windows, with items of repairing, were found necessary to be done. These were found to be unprovided for in the contract. The next term of the court was at hand, and it was imperative that the work should be done before the day of its assembling. With the full approval of the United States marshal, and of District Judge Hill, Mr. Coats undertook to furnish the new carpet, and to do all the extra work, believing that upon the proper representation being made he would be compensated. The fact that the United States marshal and judge of the court concurred as to the necessity of the work being done, that it was well done, and the charges reasonable, and that they jointly recommend the payment of the claim, is set forth in a statement to that effect, over their signatures, now in the hands of the committee.

The claimant brings in a bill in items amounting to $986.76, which, it is alleged, was for repairs and furnishing outside of the contract and of the plans of the State architect.

Your committee are of the opinion that although the claimant acted without proper authority from the Department, still he made the repairs under the pressure brought to bear upon him by the United States officers, and in perfect good faith; and that, as the Government is now in full possession and enjoyment of the repairs and furniture, it owes it to its own credit, as well as to the demand of the claimant, to make him proper compensation; and therefore recommend that the bill, which is an exact copy of a bill which passed the House of Representatives January 17, 1873, and which was reported favorably upon by the Senate Committee on Claims February 27, 1873, do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. LOUISA P. MOLLOY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Postmaster-General to credit to the account of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy, postmaster at Potosi, Washington County, Missouri, the sum of $170, on account of postage-stamps stolen from the office on the night of the 16th of December, 1872, and with the further sum of $125, being the amount of money stolen from a registered letter at the same time, the amount of which was paid by her to the owners thereof on the order of a special agent of the Post-Office Department; which credits may be allowed in favor of said Louisa P. Molloy in any settlement hereafter made by her with the Post-Office Department.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 229, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy, erroneously called Mallery in the bill, has for a number of years been postmaster at Potosi, Missouri, and that on the night of the 16th of December, 1872, the post-office in said town was burglariously entered, and postage-stamps to the value of $170 were stolen therefrom; and that at the same time the sum of $125 was stolen from a registered letter remaining in the office.

It appears that the thief effected an entrance into the post-office through an adjoining building, by raising an outside window and breaking two inside doors. The office at Potosi is of the fourth class, and Mrs. Molloy was not able to provide a safe to secure stamps and other valuables.

The building in which the office was kept was as secure as could at that time be found in Potosi, all the business part of the town having been destroyed by fire about ten days before. Prior to the time of the fire Mrs. Molloy kept the stamps and money belonging to the office in the safes of merchants in town; after the fire she was denied that privilege. At the time of the burglary the stamps and money belonging to the office were in a tin cash-box, locked, and this box was in a desk in the office, the desk being also locked. The amount of money taken from the registered letter was paid to the person to whom directed by the order of a special agent of the Post-Office Department.

Mrs. Molloy's own testimony is all the evidence in the case in reference to the burglary and the loss of the stamps and money. Her character, however, as a truthful woman and faithful officer, is indorsed by a great many leading citizens of the vicinity, including a judge of the circuit court, and the United States marshal of the eastern district of the State of Missouri.

In addition to the evidence of Mrs. Molloy, as to the extent of her loss, we have an estimate from the Post-Office Department, showing that the amount of postage-stamps and stamped envelopes on hand at said office September 30, 1872, as per quarterly returns to the Auditor, was ninety dollars; amount sent October 11, 1872, $276.40; total, $366.40; and that the average daily sales at said office for six months ending September 30, 1872, was $2.22. Taking the average daily sales at the same rate for seventy-seven days, from the 30th of September, 1872, to the day of the burglary, makes $170.94. Deducting this sum from the amount received, as above, leaves $195.95 on hand at the time of the burglary.

The evidence is satisfactory that the loss occurred without the negligence or fault of Mrs. Molloy, and she ought to be credited by the Post-Office Department with the amount of stamps lost, and the money in the registered letter, paid by her to the owners by the order of the special agent of the Post-Office Department.

Inasmuch as the bill referred to the committee does not give the correct name of the person asking for relief, your committee reports to the House a bill in the nature of a substitute, authorizing the Postmaster-General to credit Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy with the amount of stamps so lost by her and the money taken from the registered letter, and recommend that the same do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JACOB HARDING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2090) for the relief of Jacob Harding.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jacob Harding the sum of $195, as compensation for his services as inspector of the distillery of Messrs. Gordon & Co., at Paris, Illinois, in the year 1867.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Jacob Harding, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That they find that the memorialist was for several months inspector of the distillery of Messrs. Gordon & Co., at Paris, Illinois, in the seventh collection district in that State, and that for the working days from the 1st day of February to March 18, 1867, while he was inspector as aforesaid, making thirty-nine days in all, he has received no compensation for his services. It appears that Mr. Harding's account for the services was made out by him according to law, presented to the assessor of the district, approved by him, and the amount assessed against the distillery and placed in the hands of the collector of the district for collection, but was never collected, and that Gordon & Co. and their sureties finally proved to be insolvent. The facts and circumstances attending the services and making out the accounts, showing full compliance with the law on the part of Mr. Harding, are set forth in detail in his memorial, which is sworn to. It also appears that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury declined to order the payment of the claim, for the reason that there was no appropriation out of which it could be paid.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, when called upon for information in reference to this claim, says, under date of January 30, 1874: "The records of this office show that Mr. Jacob Harding has an equitable claim against the Government for the sum of $195, as his compensation for services rendered as inspector of the distillery of Messrs. Gordon & Co., at Paris, Illinois, at five dollars per day for the working days from February 1 to March 18, 1867, inclusive, the date of his delivery of the keys of their warehouse to W. Alexander, deputy collector, in compliance with the written instructions of Collector W. T. Cunningham, seventh district Illinois, dated March 10, 1867. Mr. Harding's claim, therefore, is of such a nature that it cannot be paid out of the appropriations made for internal-revenue purposes; as the law provided that those inspectors should receive their salary from their collector, it being assessed and collected from the distillers. In this case it was assessed but not collected, and it appears that owing to the insolvency of the distillers and of their sureties it cannot now be collected from them."

The evidence is conclusive that Mr. Harding rendered the services as claimed in his memorial; and that the failure to collect the amount of the salary from the distillers was owing to no fault of his. Your committee, therefore, report to the House the accompanying bill, with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

COLONEL WILLIAM NORTHEDGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2091) for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of Colonel William Northedge, deceased.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the personal representatives of William Northedge, deceased, who shall be duly appointed and qualified as such, for the benefit of the widow and children of said deceased, the sum of $7,500, in full for moneys expended by said deceased in subsisting and equipping the Fifty-ninth Regiment New York State Volunteers.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Jane Northedge, widow of William Northedge, deceased, late colonel of the Fifty-ninth Regiment New York State Volunteers, ask leave to report:

That this case has twice passed the Senate, and that it passed the House in the last Congress, but was not reached in the Senate; that the same has received the investigation of several committees of Congress without adverse action or report, and that your committee, after careful examination of the case, are satisfied that it is a meritorious claim.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs, in the second session of the Forty-first Congress, reported a bill (S. No. 128) appropriating the sum of $10,260.32, which passed the Senate on the 12th of December, 1870. The report accompanying states the facts fully, and your committee adopt the same as the facts, and make it a part of their report.

The report is as follows:

"It appears, upon examination, that on or about the 1st day of June, 1861, Colonel Northedge commenced recruiting troops for the United States Volunteer Army; that on or about July 24, 1861, he reported to the War Department and was authorized to complete a regiment of volunteers; that at that time he had five companies, and had established a camp at Elm Park, Staten Island, Richmond County, New York, and that from the 1st day of June, 1861, to the 13th day of October, 1861—at which time his men were consolidated with others and formed the Fifty-ninth New York State Volunteers—he had expended large sums in subsisting said men.

"It appears, upon an examination of official copies of affidavits on file in the War Department, furnished by the honorable Secretary of War to your committee, that the sum of $5,490 was paid for provisions; that the sum of $3,525 was paid for wall and A tents; that $451.32 was paid for rent of offices; that $388 was paid for printing, and that the sum of $406 was paid for stoves and for camp and garrison equipage; and that the total amount thus expended by Colonel Northedge was $10,260.32.

"It further appears that at the time these various purchases were made, receipts and vouchers covering the entire amount of said expenditures were obtained by said Northedge, and by his order were carefully filed away with other valuable papers, and were lost in the month of August, 1862, in the following manner, to wit: While the Army was lying at Harrison's Landing, Virginia, an order was issued by Major-General George B. McClellan, ordering all the extra baggage of officers to be forwarded to a place of safety, and the Army to be in readiness to move in light marching order; and that, in obedience to the said order, Colonel Northedge ordered his trunk to be placed in charge of the regimental quartermaster, and by him to be transported to barges lying at Harrison's Landing, Virginia, to be shipped to Washington, District of Columbia, and from thence to their destination. That his trunk, containing the bills and receipts heretofore referred to, including other papers pertaining to the organization until the 13th day of October, 1861, with his extra clothing, was carefully marked and directed to be shipped by express from Washington, District of Columbia, to Baltimore, Maryland, and that his trunk was lost or stolen after delivery on board the barge as aforesaid; that he has made diligent search for the same, but without success. While the petitioner in this case is unable to produce the proper receipts for the expenditures made, it is shown by positive evidence from whom the purchases were made, and the reason why other vouchers cannot be produced is satisfactorily accounted for in the affidavit of James H. Birdsall, late captain in said regiment. It is in evidence that there were about two hundred men subsisted daily from the 1st of June, 1861, to the 1st of October, 1861; and further, that the men were accepted by the United States Government.

"The committee further find that the said Northedge during his life-time presented the aforesaid claim to the War Department for adjudication, and that the same was rejected for the reason that he, Northedge, was unable to comply with a certain order existing in regard to the payment of such claims, to wit, furnishing receipts of the parties to whom payment was made, the reason being, as heretofore stated, that such receipts were unavoidably lost with his baggage. It further appears that the said Northedge is now deceased, and has left a widow surviving; that his record while in the United States Army was good; that he subsisted out of his own private funds an average of two hundred men daily from the 1st day of June, 1861, to the 13th day of October, 1861; and that the Government in the hour of trial had the aid and services of the men thus recruited.

"Your committee, therefore, firmly believe that the claim is just in every particular, and earnestly recommend that the bill be at once passed for the full amount of said claim."

Your committee are of opinion that the action of the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives of the last Congress in reducing the amount allowed to $7,500 was dictated by prudence, in view of the fact that a portion of the evidence was ex parte, and that amount your committee believe to be fully warranted by the evidence in the case.

Your committee, therefore, report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. DIVINE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $738.83, in full payment for services rendered as assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, from the 8th day of May, 1863, to the 1st day of October, 1863.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Dr. John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, having had the same under consideration, ask leave to report:

That the facts of the case are fully set forth in the petition of the claimant, which is herewith appended and made a part of this report:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, John W. Divine, a citizen of Claiborne County aforesaid, respectfully represents that on the 8th day of May, 1863, he was enlisted in the service of the United States by Major Edward Black, of the Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, at Lebanon, Kentucky, and was by said Major Black at once placed upon duty as assistant surgeon of said Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, there being no other medical officer in the command at that time.

Your petitioner continued to discharge the duties of assistant surgeon as aforesaid until the 1st day of October, 1863, when he was commissioned as assistant surgeon of said regiment, Dr. G. R. Brandeau having been some time prior thereto commissioned as surgeon of said organization, to wit, May 28, 1863.

Your petitioner further shows that during the interval between his enlistment, May 8, 1863, and the date of his commission, October 1, 1863, he received no pay nor allowances for his services as aforesaid, although, during the whole of said period of nearly five months, he was constantly on duty with that portion of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers which was stationed at Lebanon, Kentucky, under the command of Major Edward Black. Your petitioner, believing himself entitled to pay for said services, filed his claim therefor with the Second Auditor United States Treasury, and afterward applied to the Adjutant-General United States Army for a correction of said muster, so as to enable him to obtain his pay for the period as aforesaid, but he was unsuccessful in both of said undertakings, as will be seen by referring to the annexed exhibits, which he hereby makes a part of this petition, and failing as aforesaid, he has been compelled to abandon the further prosecution of said claim before the Treasury Department. Your petitioner herewith submits the affidavits of the said Major Edward Black and Surgeon G. R. Brandeau, late officers of the said Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, as evidence in support of his said claim.

Your petitioner would further state that some time after the war he was appointed examining surgeon of the Pension Bureau, at Tazewell, Tennessee, which office he held for a considerable length of time and then resigned. The premises considered, your petitioner prays that your honorable body pass a special act granting him the relief sought, being the amount as shown in the following itemized account, namely, $738.83½, to which amount he is justly entitled for services rendered. And your petitioner would ever pray, &c.

The United States to John W. Divine, Dr.

To services as assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, from the 8th day of May, 1863, to the 1st day of October, 1863, four months and twenty-three days, at $155 per month... $738 83½

JOHN W. DIVINE,
Late Assistant Surgeon Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry.

STATE OF TENNESSEE, Claiborne County:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, John W. Divine, the foregoing petitioner, to me well known as credible, and made oath, in due form of law, that the matters stated in the foregoing petition and account are true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 27th day of November, 1871.

[SEAL.] J. N. TREECE,
Clerk Circuit Court said County.

The proof adduced in support of the claim establishes the fact to the satisfaction of the committee that the services were rendered as claimed, and that the petitioner is entitled to compensation therefor.

They therefore report the accompanying bill, with the recommendation that the same do pass.

There being no objection the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER S. PATTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 753) for the relief of Peter S. Patton.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that whereas in the month of March, 1872, the post-office at Burlington, in the State of Kansas, was burglariously entered and robbed of public moneys and property to the amount of $420; and whereas such robbery was effected without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster, Peter S. Patton; and whereas said Patton has paid to the United States the amount and value of said moneys and property so stolen, and expended in the pursuit and arrest of the burglars the further sum of $100; therefore the bill provides that there shall be paid to the said Peter S. Patton, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $510, to reimburse him for the payments and expenses so by him made and incurred.

There being no objection the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GENERAL SAMUEL W. CRAWFORD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army.

The bill was read. It proposes so to amend the retirement as a colonel, on February 19, 1873, for disability on account of a wound received in battle, of Brevet Major-General S. W. Crawford, United States Army, that the said Crawford shall be retired and be borne on the retired list of the Army as a major-general as of and from the said date, he having been in the exercise of the command of a major-general at the time he was wounded, being then in command of the first division of the Twelfth Army Corps.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Colonel and Brevet Major-General Samuel W. Crawford, asking for an amendment of his record on the retired list, and the bill (H. R. No. 1182) in relation to same subject, beg leave to submit the following report:

That the records of the War Department and the letter of its Secretary show the following facts:

At the battle of Antietam, on the 17th of September, 1862, General Crawford, then holding the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers, and exercising the command of a major-general over the first division, Twelfth Corps, to which he had succeeded upon the killing of General J. K. F. Mansfield, was severely wounded in the right thigh by a musket-ball.

Upon recovery from the immediate prostration caused by the wound, he continued, notwithstanding it, in active service, participating in the battle of Gettysburgh and other principal engagements of the Army of the Potomac, including the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Jericho Mills, Bethesda Church, Petersburgh, and Weldon Railroad, until after the surrender of Lee at Appomattox Court-House.

On the 22d of February, 1869, General Crawford, having been since March 10, 1851, in continuous service in the regular Army, was commissioned, in the ordinary course of promotion, colonel of the Second Infantry, United States Army.

His disability in consequence of his wound, which is still open, having increased to such an extent as to entitle him to be retired, he applied August 29, 1871, to the Secretary of War to be ordered before a retiring board. This application was not granted, because, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, "the condition of the Army demanded that other officers should have the preference in being retired at that particular time."

As the Secretary also certifies, if General Crawford had been retired at the time of his application he would have been entitled to have been retired as a major-general, in accordance with the provision of the act of Congress of July 28, 1866, section 32 of chapter 299, as follows: "That officers of the regular Army entitled to be retired on account of disability occasioned by wounds received in battle, may be retired upon the full rank of the command held by them, whether in the regular or volunteer service at the time such wounds were received."

This act continued to be in force for about ten months after General Crawford's application above stated, and until it was repealed as to its future operation by the act of June 10, 1872.

On the 19th of February, 1873, he was placed, with the rank of colonel, on the retired list of the Army.

While the law of 1866 above quoted was in force, seventy-two officers of the regular Army were retired with increased rank in accordance with the provisions of that law. Many of these officers holding rank inferior to that of the memorialist were retired as general officers. Thus one lieutenant-colonel, who was a major-general of volunteers, was retired with that rank in the Army; one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, and a captain, who held the rank of brigadier-general in the volunteers, were retired as major-generals in the Army.

The question now presenting itself to this committee does not relate to the propriety or expediency of the provision of the act of July 28, 1866, for retirement with increased rank. Whatever view may be entertained upon such a question, it seems manifest to the committee that it could not have been the intention of Congress in repealing that statute to thereby cause any invidious or unfair discrimination against any officer who, having been fully entitled to the benefit of that liberal legislation, has by mere accident, without fault or laches of his own, been debarred from such benefit.

It doubtless was rather the view of Congress in passing the repealing act that all officers who were properly entitled or deserved to be retired upon the rank held or exercised by them when wounded probably had already been retired, and that therefore the time had arrived for discontinuing the general operation of the statute of 1866, leaving any case which, for any cause, had been omitted to be acted upon to be passed upon by Congress according to its merits, and provided for, if thought proper, by a special act.

Such a case most clearly is the one now under consideration.

Having continued in active service despite a severe and unhealed wound, General Crawford now finds himself, owing to this very adherence to duty, and the concurring delay of action upon his application for retirement, occupying an anomalous position upon the retired list, where he stands below both his peers and inferiors in lineal rank and in command.

It is considered by the committee that to rectify this hardship would be merely a righteous act of rigid justice, as well as a fit recognition of constant and faithful service for nearly a quarter of a century in both peace and war—in the late war, beginning with the defense of Sumter and ending only with hostilities. To do otherwise would in reality be to enforce the degradation of a meritorious officer for no better cause than that he preferred a patient devotion to duty rather than such a persistent importunity as might have timely secured him the advantages provided by law.

The committee therefore recommend the accompanying bill for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to that bill as it requires more consideration than can be given to it on objection day.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order, the report having been read, that it is in the nature of debate, and objection cannot be made by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as it has been uniformly held that the reading of a report on objection day is not in the nature of debate. The bill is objected to.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. ALBRIGHT said: I understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] withdraws his objections to the bill No. 2093, for the relief of General Crawford.

Mr. HOLMAN. While I think legislation of this kind ought to be general, I am told that the case of General Crawford is a very exceptional one, and that he is the only officer who would be affected by the provisions of a general law, or the revival of the act of 1866. Under these circumstances I withdraw my objection.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

WILLIAM A. SNODGRASS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2095) for the relief of William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to pay to William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry Regiment, his pay and allowances as second lieutenant from March 30, 1865, to July 9, 1865, out of any money appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for the pay of the Army.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William A. Snodgrass, first lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, beg leave to report as follows:

Lieutenant Snodgrass commenced his service in the Army as a private soldier with his regiment in 1861, and served until the close of the war.

On the 7th of June, 1865, his regiment was ordered from Washington, District of Columbia, to Louisville, Kentucky, and while en route it passed within twelve miles of his home. It seems, according to the sworn statement of Lieutenant Snodgrass, that he had important papers to execute and acknowledge, and being informed by his commanding officer that he could obtain no regular leave, he went on an informal leave, from Parkersburgh to his home in Marietta, Ohio, by railroad, attended to his business, and immediately proceeded by rail to Louisville, Kentucky, to join his regiment, where he would have arrived before his regiment, had he not been delayed by a train being thrown off the track—the regiment having traveled from Parkersburgh to Louisville by steamer. He was absent from his regiment from the 8th to the 13th of June, 1865; arrived in Louisville the day after his regiment. For this absence he was tried before a court-martial June 20, 1865, and convicted and sentenced to be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States, although the court was not unanimous in this sentence.

Daniel Weber, his colonel, says Lieutenant Snodgrass invariably conducted himself as a good and obedient soldier, conspicuously brave in action, and ever ready to perform any duty assigned him. He was one of the best men in the regiment. The facts in relation to his absence from his command, which resulted in his being tried by a court-martial, are as he states them, and taking into consideration the circumstances of his absence and its very short duration, as well as the splendid record of his service for four years, the sentence of the court-martial was particularly severe, and justice to a gallant soldier requires that he should have the relief asked for.

Governor Edward F. Noyes, of Ohio, formerly colonel of the Thirty-ninth Regiment Ohio Infantry, concurs in this recommendation of Colonel Weber.

The committee therefore recommend the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

OLIVE S. BREED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 814) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Olive S. Breed, widow of I. Henry Breed, deceased, who was a private in Company K, Fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have had under consideration House bill No. 814, granting a pension to Olive S. Breed, and submit the following report:

An examination of this case discloses the following facts: I. Henry Breed enlisted in Company K, Fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, on or about the 20th day of April, 1861, under the proclamation of the President of the United States calling for seventy-five thousand men. Said Breed remained with his company at Chilton, drilling and preparing for the service, until the 17th day of June, 1861, when said company (K) was marched to Racine, in the State of Wisconsin, where it went into camp with the other companies of the said Fourth Regiment. After a continued and honorable discharge of his duties in said company of about two months, and just before the arrival of the mustering officer, said Breed was taken sick with a cold brought on by the exposures of the camp, in the line of his duty. This sickness resulted in quick consumption, with which disease he died on the 8th day of September, 1861, leaving a widow, the petitioner, Olive S. Breed, and four small children, three girls and one boy, and leaving no property except a poor house, on a small lot in the village of Chilton, in which the said petitioner has lived and remained a widow until the present time, supporting her family entirely by her own labor. And the said petitioner certifies that her health and strength will not permit her to labor much longer, as her constitution is now nearly broken down by hard work.

These facts are subsfantiated by the testimony of the surgeon who attended Private Breed during his sickness, all the county officers where petitioner resides, and also by General Harrison C. Hobart, who makes the following statement:

"I have read the petition of Mrs. Olive S. Breed, and of my own knowledge can certify that the facts therein stated are substantially true. As captain of Company K, Fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, I enlisted the said I. Henry Breed, mentioned in said petition; and the said Breed was on duty with his company about two months before he was taken sick. Had the mustering officer reached the camp a few days earlier, Private Breed, who was sick in the camp at the time of his arrival, would have been mustered into the service. I carried him to his home, distant about one hundred miles from the camp, where he died, as stated in the widow's petition."

Being satisfied from the foregoing statement of facts that the petitioner, Olive S. Breed, has been deprived of the assistance and support of her husband by his volunteering in the service of the United States, and that her husband, said I. Henry Breed, died from a disease contracted in the line of his duty in said service, therefore your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANN CRANE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls the name of Ann Crane, widow of the late Benson B. Crane, of Pickens County, South Carolina, and pay her a pension at the rate of fifteen dollars per month; said pension to commence from the date of the approval of this act and continue during her widowhood.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Mrs. Ann Crane, the applicant, is a resident of Pickens County, South Carolina, and the widow of Benson B. Crane, who was killed by the rebels in 1864, on account of his adherence to the Union forces. Said Benson B. Crane, as is shown by the affidavits of the officers themselves, had secreted, fed, clothed, and piloted several officers, to wit, Hannibal A. Johnston, Samuel Gilman, James Cheeds, B. F. Blair, James B. Pomphrey, Charles H. Byrdrick, H. M. Anderson, and others, who were escaped prisoners of war, across the mountains into the Union lines in East Tennessee, and after his return to his home, as he was about to remove his family and a force of loyal men into the Union lines in East Tennessee, his place of concealment was detected by the rebel conscript forces, and they, knowing of his services to their enemy, surprised their camp, and shot down Benson B. Crane and wounded one of the comrades.

Mrs. Crane is now left with a family of small children and without means of support; and your committee, considering the fact that her husband was killed in defense of his country, and carrying out the orders he had received from the Government forces in East Tennessee, would make a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN C. FARNAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 240) granting a pension to John C. Farnam.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John C. Farnam, of Westmoreland, in the State of New Hampshire, who was a private in Company E, Fifteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PENELOPE C. BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 330) granting a pension to Mrs. Penelope C. Brown, of Tennessee, widow of Stephen C. Brown, late a private of Company C, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Penelope C. Brown, of Greene County, Tennessee, widow of Stephen C. Brown, late a private of Company C, Eighth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Penelope C. Brown, widow of Stephen C. Brown, asking a pension, submit the following report:

The committee find, upon a careful examination, there is but one question involved in this application; that is as to the death of the husband, Stephen C. Brown.

The proof is conclusive in regard to his enlistment, capture, and imprisonment in Virginia. It is equally conclusive regarding his feeble condition, when last seen by witness on his way to exchange boat, but witness does not know that he was exchanged. This was on the 22d of February, 1865. The muster-roll on file in adjutant-general's office in Tennessee shows he was sick in hospital at Baltimore March 20, 1865, just one month from the date when last seen at Richmond, Virginia, on his way to exchange boat. This is the last that has ever been seen or heard of him. The proof shows also that when captured he went under an assumed name, having been drafted in the rebel army, which may account for the absence of his name on the hospital record at Baltimore.

Under all the circumstances, your committee is forced to the conviction that this is a meritorious case, and therefore report favorably.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CHARLES M'CARTY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Charles McCarty.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles McCarty, late an engineer on the Mississippi Railroad, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Charles McCarty, for a pension, have had the same under consideration, and find the following facts well established:

Charles McCarty, on and preceding the 15th day of June, 1863, was an employé of the United States, as a locomotive engineer, in the State of Tennessee, and was engaged in running trains on the Mississippi Central Railroad, between Grand Junction and Bolivar, Tennessee. On the 15th of June, 1863, he had charge of the locomotive running a reconnoitering party of Federal troops on said railroad, and while passing over some part of the road that was trestled, the track and trestlework gave way in consequence of the removal of some supporting timbers by the rebels, and the locomotive (with Mr. McCarty) was thrown some distance to the ground. To the engine was attached a gun-car, as it is called. It seems to have been in front of the engine. A six-pound James rifle, with ammunition and shells, were on the car. In the fall the engine was thrown on top of the cannon and shells, which, exploding, caused the boiler of the engine to burst. In the fall Mr. McCarty was fastened by the pressure of the wood and tool-boxes against the end of the boiler, near the furnace of the engine, and, besides being badly scalded, was seriously and permanently injured in shoulder, head, and legs. Dr. Goodwin says he was thus injured: "Severe and complete fracture of the left clavicle, which was not adjusted at the time of the injury, causing and leaving a permanent non-union, thereby disabling the left shoulder and arm for life; also both of his legs are injured from scalds of the flesh and periosteum, that will, in my opinion, cause permanent disability, amounting to two-thirds; disabled from obtaining his subsistance from manual labor." Eleven good citizens of Mitchell, Indiana, including the circuit clerk, the surgeon of the Fiftieth Indiana Volunteers, and the major of that regiment, bear testimony to the permanency and severity of his injuries. These gentlemen, with two others, McCorvick and Herman, prove the identity of Charles McCarty. J. D. Webster, late brevet major-general, states that he was at the time of the injury superintendent of military railroads in Tennessee, and remembers the case. From the evidence before the committee they arrive at the conclusion that Mr. McCarty was at the time of the injury in the service of the Government, engaged in the most perilous business; that he received pay from the Government as an engineer, and that he is now an object of pity, caused by his fidelity to the Government. A pension is recommended for him. It is one of those cases which, although it may not be reached or covered by the wording of section 1 of pension law 1873, yet it is covered by the spirit of the same.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SOPHRONIA AUSTIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2097) granting a pension to Sophronia Austin.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sophronia Austin, widow of Charles Austin, late of Company I, Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

Charles Austin was wagoner of Company I, Second Regiment Wisconsin Infantry. He died suddenly in Arkansas, while out with his troops on a scout, on the 25th July, 1862, with a disease contracted in the line of his duty. Dr. Alexander McBean, assistant surgeon of the regiment, says he knew Austin; says he died suddenly on 25th July, 1862, in Arkansas; says he died of heart disease, he supposes; says he was sound when he enlisted. Dr. Peck, in a sworn statement, says he knew Charles Austin; was his family physician two years preceding his enlistment; says he was a sound, healthy man at the time of enlistment, capable of doing all kinds of labor. Dr. Peck says he knew Charles Austin and Sophronia Austin lived together as man and wife, and were recognized as man and wife.

The committee recommend a pension.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES ROACH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2096) granting a pension to James Roach.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Roach, late a gunner on the ship Plymouth, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee have had under consideration the case of James Roach, and report in favor of granting a pension to him.

It seems that Mr. Roach was a seaman and second gunner on the ship Plymouth, and was honorably discharged from the service of the Government on the 28th of December, 1858, by reason of injuries received by the bursting of a cannon. One eye was put out; the other was injured. Mr. Roach was a good seaman. Commodore John A. Dahlgren, in July, 1861, gave Mr. Roach a letter of recommendation, and it is indorsed by Secretary Gideon Welles. Mr. Roach was acting as gunner on board of the Plymouth at the time of the bursting of the cannon. This was at the time when the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Usher, was killed. He should have been pensioned before this.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. NANCY PARKHURST.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2098) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy Parkhurst.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Nancy Parkhurst, mother of Wilfred Parkhurst, late a private in Company H, Twelfth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, and pay her arrears of pension from the date of her said son's death to the date of her pension certificate.

The report was read, as follows:

Mrs. Nancy Parkhurst, the applicant, is the mother of Wilfred Parkhurst, late private in Company H, Twelfth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, who died in the United States service, and in line of duty, September 13, 1862. In the year 1865 she made application for a pension through a claim agent, having all the papers duly made out and left in the hands of her agent to be forwarded. The evidence shows that about this time the office of her agent, with all the contents, was burned, and though they then supposed that the papers had all been forwarded to the Commissioner of Pensions, it seems that they were not, and that they were also destroyed with the agent's office. This fact they had not discovered until the five years' limitation had run, when she then applied for, and is now receiving, a pension as the dependent mother of said soldier.

Your committee, considering the fact that she was entitled to a pension and has so proven, are of the opinion that she should not be deprived of her arrears of pension, for it was no fault of hers that the application was not filed. A bill was passed by the Forty-third Congress in favor of the petitioner, but for want of time it was not reached by the Senate.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. ELIZABETH COPELAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2099) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Copeland.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Copeland, widow of Henry Copeland, late a private in Company D, First Connecticut Heavy Artillery, and pay her arrears of pension from the date of the death of said Henry Copeland to the date of her pension certificate.

The report was read, as follows:

Elizabeth Copeland, the applicant, is the widow of Henry Copeland, late private in Company D, First Connecticut Heavy Artillery, and who died in the service in 1862. The widow made application through one E. L. Cundall, and while the papers were in his office, the office and the contents were burned. The claimant supposed the application had been filed with the Commissioner, and did not know of the fact of its not being filed till the five years' limitation had run, when she then made application for, and is now receiving, the pension due her.

The committee, considering the fact that she was entitled to her pension, are of the opinion that she should be allowed the arrears due her, for she used all the means in her power to file the application within the time. The last Congress passed a bill in favor of the petitioner, but for want of time it was not reached by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this matter of the date of the pension should be made the subject of general legislation. There ought to be some rule. I do not object to this bill in particular, but I insist that all this class of bills should be made the subject of general legislation.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

OLIVER C. DENSLOW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 360) granting a pension to Oliver C. Denslow.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Oliver C. Denslow, late hospital steward of the Eighteenth Regiment of Missouri Volunteer Infantry, now of Putnam County, in the State of Missouri, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

Brief of claim to original invalid pension in the case of Oliver C. Denslow, a hospital steward, of Company F, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

Post-office address: Livonia, Putnam County, Missouri.

Enlisted September 4, 1861, discharged May 22, 1862. Served afterward from ——, 18—, to ——, 18—. No re-enlistment. Filed May 20, 1871.

Declaration and identification in due form, filed June 22, 1863.

Alleges disability from deafness, from exposure in the wet, cold weather, in the fall and winter of 1861, in the northwest of Missouri.

1. Roll for January and February, 1862, reports claimant nurse in post hospital, Saint Joseph, since February 9, 1862.

2. Affidavit of Privates James H. Forbs and Samuel Garringer, filed March 16, 1867, shows that claimant became disabled about the 12th day of February, 1862, while in the service of the United States, and in the line of his duty; that during the month of November, 1861, while on a march from Unionville, Putnam County, Missouri, to Laclede, in Linn County, Missouri, he was exposed to cold and wet, from which cause, having taken neuralgia and catarrh in the head, he became deaf; that he was in good health at the time he entered the service; that he became so deaf that he could not hear any conversation, and could hear a cannon but a very short distance.

3. Affidavit of Privates Thomas Franklin and Absalom Garringer, filed March 16, 1867, corroborates the above, and that he was in good health at enlistment.

4. Affidavit of Thomas Franklin and Absalom Garringer, filed March 16, 1867, shows that they have been acquainted with claimant for the last three years, and that he has been disabled from procuring a livelihood as much as if he had been wounded.

5. Affidavit of Captain Henry P. Stults, filed October 1, 1867, shows that claimant became deaf at the time and in the manner stated above; that he was in good health, and his hearing was good at the time he entered the service; that at the present time he is too deaf to perform the duties of a soldier.

6. Affidavit of Regimental Surgeon William O. Torrey, filed May 20, 1871, shows that claimant was acting as hospital steward, and was detailed as surgeon to accompany a scout from Laclede, in Linn County, Missouri, to Unionville, Putnam County, Missouri; that he was in good health when he left the post in Laclede; that while absent on said scout, and in the discharge of his duty as surgeon of said detachment, he contracted a deafness, for which he was discharged; that said disability still exists, and will probably continue until death.

7. Affidavit of claimant, filed May 20, 1871, shows that he was treated in the regimental hospital at Weston, Missouri, at post hospital at Saint Joseph, Missouri, and at the general hospital at Hamburgh, Tennessee; that he was treated by the surgeons at said hospitals, but was never enrolled as a patient in either of them; that he was hospital steward at said regimental and post hospitals, and assistant post surgeon at the last-named hospital.

Barred by the act of July 4, 1864. Admitted January 3, 1872.

Present, SAMUEL V. NILES.

H. P. LEECH,
Examiner.

The committee adopt the above brief as their report, and recommend the passage of the bill granting Oliver C. Denslow a pension.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARTIN HOFF AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2100) for the relief of Martin Hoff, Casper Doerr, and George Gebhart, citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,618.62 to Martin Hoff and Casper Doerr, for work and labor performed and material furnished by them in curbing, guttering, and macadamizing, and crosswalks on Marine avenue, and paving alley in front of and adjoining United States marine hospital in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri; and the sum of $616.58 to George Gebhart, for work performed and material furnished in paving sidewalks on Marine avenue, adjoining to and in front of the United States marine hospital in Saint Louis, Missouri; in all, the sum of $3,235.20.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the memorial of Martin Hoff, Casper Doerr, and George Gebhart, citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri, asking that Congress make an appropriation to pay them for work performed and material furnished in paving, guttering, curbing, macadamizing, laying crosswalks, and sidewalks on Marine avenue in front of the United States marine hospital, and paving an alley contiguous thereto in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, make the following report:

That, under the charter and ordinances of the city of Saint Louis, property-holders are required to bear the expense of all paving of streets and alleys and for laying sidewalks adjacent to their property; that the two first-named petitioners are entitled to the sum of $2,618.62 for labor performed and material furnished in macadamizing, paving, guttering, curbing, and laying crosswalks on Marine avenue and the alley in front of and adjacent to the United States marine hospital in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri.

That the last-named petitioner is entitled to the sum of $616.58 for labor performed and material furnished in laying sidewalk on Marine avenue in front of the United States marine hospital in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri. That the work was performed by these petitioners during the year 1872, under contract with the city of Saint Louis, Missouri; that its completion in a satisfactory manner is attested to by the certificate of the surveyor of the port of Saint Louis accompanying this report; that the Secretary of the Treasury, whose letter also accompanies this report, recommends that an appropriation be made to pay these petitioners, in all, the sum of $3 235.20; and that the work was performed and material furnished at a reasonable rate.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

STEAMER CLARA DOLSEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2101) for the relief of the owners of the steamer Clara Dolsen.

Mr. MCKEE objected; and the bill was accordingly passed over.

LAND IN SCOTT COUNTY, MISSOURI.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2187) authorizing and requiring the issuance of a patent for certain land in the county of Scott, in the State of Missouri.

The bill was read. In the preamble it recites that whereas by the act of the Congress of the United States entitled "An act to quiet the title to certain lands in the State of Missouri," approved December 27, 1872, certain lands therein mentioned were granted to the county of Scott, in the State of Missouri, which were not specifically described; and whereas no provision for the issuance of a patent for said lands was made in said act; therefore it provides that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause a patent to be issued to said county of Scott, in the State of Missouri, for all the lands included in that portion of township numbered 27 north, of range 12 east of the fifth principal meridian, lying east of Little River, as the same appears on the plat of survey on file in the General Land Office; provided that nothing in the act shall prejudice the rights of any person claiming any of said lands by virtue of any homestead, pre-emption, or other entry made under the laws of the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims submit the following report:

By an act approved December 27, 1872, Congress granted to Scott County, Missouri, 4,410.71 acres of land, described as follows: Parts of sections 1, 2, 3, 11, 12, 13, 24, and 25, all in township 27, range 12, in said county. The description in this grant is vague and indefinite, and the act makes no provision for a patent. The present bill is designed to remedy these defects by specifically ascertaining the lands and providing for the issuance of a patent therefor to said county.

Township 27, in said county of Scott, was surveyed in 1860 under the authority of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the survey was approved by the surveyor-general of Missouri in July, 1861, and at the same time said surveyor-general forwarded to the General Land Office a list of swamp selections, which embraced all of said township lying west of the Little River, except section 16. These selections were approved October 14, 1865, and patented to the State January 3, 1866.

This patent disposed of the entire township except section 16 (reserved for schools) and that portion of the township lying east of Little River. That portion of the township lying east of the river contains 4,412.69 acres, and these are the lands intended to be granted by the act of December 27, 1872.

The committee, therefore, report back the bill with the accompanying substitute, which specifically ascertains and describes the lands in question, and recommend that said substitute do pass.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise and report the bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NIBLACK reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with the recommendation that they do pass.

BILLS PASSED.

The House proceeded to consider and pass the following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole:

A bill (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis;

A bill (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont;

An act (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis;

A bill (H. R. No. 763) for the relief of Oliver P. Mason;

A bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 2088) for the relief of James Lillie, postmaster at Lisbonville, Ray County, Missouri;

A bill (H. R. No. 764) for the relief of John Dold;

A bill (H. R. No. 692) for the relief of William Chester;

A bill (H. R. No. 650) for the relief of John Brennan;

A bill (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of James Coats, of Jackson, Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy;

A bill (H. R. No. 2090) for the relief of Jacob Harding;

A bill (H. R. No. 2091) for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of Colonel William Northedge, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 753) for the relief of Peter S. Patton;

A bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 2094) for the relief of William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2094½) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Bell;

A bill (H. R. No. 52) granting an annuity to Mary Swift, daughter of Thomas Truxton, deceased, late commodore in the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 814) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed;

A bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane;

A bill (H. R. No. 240) granting a pension to John C. Farnam;

A bill (H. R. No. 330) granting a pension to Mrs. Penelope C. Brown, of Tennessee, widow of Stephen C. Brown, late a private in Company C, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Charles McCarty;

A bill (H. R. No. 2097) granting a pension to Sophronia Austin;

A bill (H. R. No. 2096) granting a pension to James Roach;

A bill (H. R. No. 2098) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy Parkhurst;

A bill (H. R. No. 2099) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Copeland;

A bill (H. R. No. 360) granting a pension to Oliver C. Denslow;

A bill (H. R. No. 2100) for the relief of Martin Hoff, Casper Doerr, and George Gebhart, citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2187) authorizing and requiring the issuance of a patent for certain land in the county of Scott, in the State of Missouri.

The following bills were reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments:

A bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bills, as amended, were passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

EDWARD JARDINE.

Mr. MELLISH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2356) granting a pension to Edward Jardine, late colonel and brevet brigadier-general, United States Volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WOODFORD. I would ask unanimous consent that that bill be put on its passage. It provides a pension for a gallant officer who lost a leg in what were known as the "draft riots" in New York City in the perilous summer of 1863. It has been unanimously reported by the committee, and there can be no objection to it.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward Jardine, late brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers, at the rate of fifty dollars per month, from and after the passage of this act; and in the case of the death of the said Edward Jardine, the amount of pension allowed by this act shall be continued to his widow or minor children, under the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOODFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SHIPPING COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2357) to amend the act authorizing the appointment of shipping commissioners, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report, to accompany House bill No. 2079, (now on the General Calendar,) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was ordered to be printed.

MARSHAL FOR WESTERN DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I ask consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the western judicial district of North Carolina." The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order. It passed the last Congress, and is the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary of this Congress.

The bill, which was read, provides for amending section 8 of the act of June 4, 1872, entitled "An act to establish a western judicial district of North Carolina," by adding thereto the following:

There shall also be appointed a marshal of the United States for said western district of North Carolina, who shall receive such fees and compensation, and exercise such powers and perform such duties, as are fixed and enjoined by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. How did it happen that there were no marshal provided for this district when it was established?

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. At that time it was consented to by all parties here that the business of the courts would be accelerated by the then marshal retaining control of all matters in both districts. That arrangement met with the approval of all parties in Congress at that time. This bill is now reported unanimously from the Committee on the Judiciary, and meets no opposition from the North Carolina delegation here.

Mr. HOLMAN. While I think the second district of North Carolina should not have been formed, it seems to be inevitable that, having been formed, a marshal should be provided for that district. I will not object to the bill.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH BRAY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2358) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bray, widow of Edward Bray, late a private of the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have considered at this time a bill to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to reserve from sale ten thousand suits of old and disused Army uniform clothing now in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and to transfer the same to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

No objection was made; and the bill (H. R. No. 2359) was read three times, and passed.

ADDITIONAL JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN NEW YORK.

Mr. TREMAIN. I ask consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 2083, a bill to establish an additional judicial district in the State of New York, and to make further provisions in relation to the courts of the United States in said State.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object.

APPOINTMENTS ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SENER, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. MELLISH, ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on Invalid Pensions. If no objection be made they will be excused, and Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, and Mr. SMART, of New York, will be appointed in their places.

The House on yesterday, by its action in the election case of Thomas vs. Davis, from the State of Virginia, has rendered it necessary to appoint a member of the Committee on Agriculture to take the place of Mr. Davis. The gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. DAVIS, will be appointed in his place.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BERRY was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. BUNDY was granted leave of absence for two weeks.

SESSIONS FOR DEBATE.

Mr. McCRARY. I move that the House now take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the session of this evening will be for debate only, upon the bill in relation to commerce by railroad between the several States. On Monday last the House, under a suspension of the rules, ordered that the session of to-morrow should be for debate only as in Committee of the Whole upon the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means repealing the tax on matches, and upon kindred bills, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Members of the Committee on Ways and Means say that the debate was to be after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That is not the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It was for the entire day.

Mr. RANDALL. That is my recollection.

The SPEAKER. The committees were called through this morning for reports of a private nature, and there would be no business of that character for a morning hour to-morrow, Saturday being private-bill day. If the record of the Journal be that the debate was to be after the morning hour, that is contrary to the recollection of the Chair. Is there objection that the entire day of to-morrow shall be for debate only? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered. The House, therefore, will meet to-morrow for debate only upon the bill for the repeal of the tax on matches, &c.

This evening the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ROSS, will preside as Speaker pro tempore. To-morrow the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. WILSON, will preside as Speaker pro tempore.

The motion for a recess was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. ROSS in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1385) reported by the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, entitled "An act to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the object sought by the bill before the House is cheaper transportation. Into the discussion of this question will enter the quantities to be moved, the past and present methods of moving merchandise, the rate charged, the routes in use, present and prospective, points to be reached, the countries with which we compete, and the future needs of the country in this respect. I purpose to speak upon one branch of the subject, the movement of the grain and meat products of the Northwest, as the whole is too comprehensive for an hour.

If it be necessary to offer excuses for so circumscribing my remarks, I will say that the strongest reason given for opening any new canal, or widening any old one, for improving any river, or building a Government railroad, is that provision may be made for the rapidly increasing surplus of this region.

The manufacturer of the East looks to this locality for his bread.

The cotton and sugar-cane planters of the South regard the price of grain an important factor in their operations.

The problem presented for the solution of Congress now is, how can the surplus products of the West be transported to market where there is a deficiency, so as to bring the prime necessities of life within the reach of the consumer in our own country and encourage their production in the bread and meat producing States? The increasing industries of the Eastern States, the growth of manufacturing and mining interests, the growth of cities, towns, and villages, make greater demands yearly upon the grain-producing States.

The decline of our foreign commerce has increased the cost of sea freights on our exports 66 per cent., from twelve to twenty cents per bushel, in addition to the loss of its profits to the country, thereby lessening the profit of the producer.

The agricultural changes of the last two decades have resulted in making the Atlantic slope substantially a dairy district, that portion of the country west of the Alleghanies and east of the Mississippi a meat-producing district, while the greater part of the surplus grain, especially wheat, is grown west and immediately east of the Mississippi.

The great water system of the country, that, prior to the late civil war, was used extensively for floating the staples of the interior to the sea-board at a low rate, has been little used since 1860. The advances made in the West in the knowledge of the various departments of the farm, in improved machinery, in knowledge of soil and climate, have made temporarily profitable a system of husbandry that, in reality, has consisted in making large drafts upon the hoardings that nature has for centuries been accumulating.

While the first fruits of the prairie were being gathered, and large prices were realized, the railroads, encouraged by the national and State governments, and by the people, have been extended into all the grain-fields of the Northwest; and while freights have been high little complaint has been made, the hope prevailing that the completion of the railroad system would bring regulation by competition.

But now that on many of the choicest fields the largest crops have been gathered, and the cultivator is admonished that profitable agriculture in the future must comprehend a systematic rotation of cropping and harmonious balancing of the various departments of the farm, instead of exclusive wheat raising, and it is apparent that the production of cheap, bulky breadstuffs is prohibited by high freights by rail to the consumer, it is evident that the prosperity of the Northwest will be seriously impaired, or cheaper routes must be opened for the surplus.

An inquiry into the movement of vegetable food throughout the world will establish the fact that water transportation only is profitable for long distances; and the fact that our grain-producing center has already moved beyond profitable transportation by rail, warns us that facilities must be provided for using the thirteen thousand miles of navigable waters in the interest of the grain-producing States of the Northwest.

To fully anticipate the future wants of the Northwest, as well as to provide for the present, regard must be had to the agricultural changes that are gradually taking place, as well as the realities that now exist.

The improvement of the water system of the interior is so generally conceded to be of national importance that the only questions demanding consideration concerning it are the ways and means.

But the same States that produce grain produce, in excess of their consumption also, everything of which grain is the basis; and while the excess of grain might reach the consumer by the nearest water-route to the sea-board at half the present cost, and thereby solve the transportation problem as far as the transportation of cereals is concerned, the beef, pork, and dairy products that in those States are now made in abundance, and must be shipped East by rail, will in future be the leading staples, and for the reasonableness of their transportation we cannot look to either river, lake, or canal.

If that part of the United States lying west of the Alleghanies and north of the mouth of the Ohio River was one State, it would not be so necessary for its people to ask Congress to interfere in the transportation of their surplus to market; they could regulate the carriage of their goods to the lakes, from which there is the closest competition for freight on the continent, the Saint Lawrence outlet would compete with the New York canals, and the Grand Trunk with the Erie and Central; while on the south of this great section, the open Mississippi would perpetually offer a cheap route to the ocean. State law could prevent discrimination against non-competing points, and State regulation secure reasonable tariffs. It might be possible to solve the transportation problem without the aid of Congress if each State had a navigable water-route the year round, or State lines only existed between the grand divisions known as the East, the South, and the West. But a policy, against the wisdom of which I utter no word, has formed out of the territory to which I refer, States and Territories containing nearly half the population in the Union; whose laws and occupations are kindred to each other, but having no commercial jurisdiction beyond their respective borders. In 1870 the total production of cereals in the United States was 1,467,299,183 bushels, of which 56,707,843 were exported, leaving for consumption, per capita, about 34 bushels. This district, not including California nor the States bordering on the Rocky Mountains, produced in 1870 about 1,000,000,000 bushels of grain. According to the average consumption and deficiency in the Southern States [illegible] received from this district 80,000,000 bushels. The six Eastern States, on the same basis, including New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and the District of Columbia, received 216,000,000. While our total exports of grain from the United States in 1870 were 56,707,843 bushels, they rose to nearly 100,000,000 in 1873, making the total surplus of the Northwest over 400,000,000 bushels.

The want of proper facilities to transport 400,000,000 of bushels of grain is the main object of the legislation sought; but in addition to that 500,000 tons of pork have been packed in this locality during the last season, and as many tons of live hogs are moved eastwardly during each year, and nearly all of the surplus beef and mutton; 510,025 head of cattle and 145,016 head of sheep being shipped by rail from Chicago alone during the year ending June 30, 1873.

An inquiry into the tonnage of the leading transportation lines east of the lakes will show that while their capacity is taxed to the utmost, their whole vegetable tonnage is only equal to the carriage of the deficiency east of the Alleghanies. The New York and Welland canals, the New York Central Railroad, the Erie Railroad, the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Baltimore and Ohio, and Grand Trunk, for the year 1871, only carried about 6,000,000 tons, while the deficiency in the States east of the Alleghanies is 6,500,000 tons. There are other routes to the sea-board, not named here, that have carried large quantities, more than equaling our foreign export, but this will sufficiently show the inadequacy of facilities for transporting even the present crop of the West.

This district that now produces the bread and meat for the nation, and for export, is supplied by nature with a river system second only to that of South America; and until the breaking out of our civil war, and the extension of railroads into the grain-fields of the Northwest, the water system of the Mississippi was extensively used for transporting grain to the sea-board, in the same manner in which the wheat that now comes into competition from Russia with ours is transported to the sea-board.

In 1853 the total receipts of grain at New Orleans were 8,311,422 bushels; the shipments from Chicago for that year, 6,292,233 bushels. But in 1861 the total receipts at New Orleans were but 16,191,822, while the extension of railroads brought to Chicago 50,481,862 bushels. The war then closed the river. Since that time the prostration of business in New Orleans, and the continued extension of railroads into all the grain-fields of the Northwest, has prevented the heavy staples of the Northwestern States from seeking their natural channel. The magnitude of the trade previous to the war will abundantly answer all objections that may be raised to the climatic influences of the route on cereals, without calling attention to the fact that the grain of California crosses the equator twice on its way to Europe; that wheat shipped from Chili crosses the equator on its way to England; and also, that wheat from Australia crosses the equator and the tropics.

There are no published reports of the exact amount moved East by the different lines of transportation that account for all the surplus grain of the West, nor can we definitely arrive at the cost of transportation; but the cost of carrying on the New York canals and on the lakes is obtainable. The published rates on through lines of railroad from the heart of the grain-raising districts eastwardly to the sea-board, and the cost by river to the Gulf of Mexico, are known. The Erie Canal, that in 1862 carried 84 per cent. of the grain from the lakes, now carries but 42 per cent. The New York canals, in 1861, moved 2,500,000 tons of agricultural products, while the three railroads carried only 900,000 tons. In 1872 the canals moved only 1,683,962 tons, while the railroads moved 3,670,614 tons. The canal that once was a powerful corrective between the lakes and the sea-board is now impotent, lacking capacity for future increase. Between 1869 and 1871 the amount of freight moved one mile decreased 14,802,039 tons on the canals of New York, and increased on the Erie and Central Railroads 375,701,579 tons moved one mile. The New York Central, in 1871, moved 880,327,865 tons one mile at 1.65 cents per ton per mile; the Erie Railroad moved 897,446,728 tons one mile at 1.47 cents per ton per mile. The New York canals moved 1,050,104,125 tons one mile at 1.02 cents per ton per mile. The tariff on wheat was three mills per ton per mile, showing very clearly that while the water rate is the lowest, the canals have not the capacity to move the surplus products of the West, and the railroads beat them in close competition at this low rate. The Welland Canal, in 1872, carried 625,891 tons of vegetable food.

There are three distinct movements of grain from the field to the ocean. The first is from the field to the lakes, the second from the western borders of the lakes to the canals, and the third to the sea-board. I have inquired into the movement of grain from the lakes to the sea-board, and find that the rail predominates. The total tons of vegetable food moved from the lakes by all the canals in 1872 was 2,309,853, and the total tons moved by the Central, Erie, and Pennsylvania Railroads 2,770,614. There is no hope of any further reduction from competition with these canals from the lakes.

An inquiry into the movement of grain across the lakes, or the same distance by rail, will show a state of facts no more encouraging. From Chicago, the largest shipping point on the lakes, where the railroads converge that gather the grain from the Northwest, only 2 per cent. was shipped East by rail in 1862, but in 1872, 22 per cent.

From Chicago to Buffalo in 1870 it cost, on an average, to carry a bushel of wheat 5.89 cents; from Buffalo to New York, 11.56; from Chicago to Oswego, 9 cents; from Oswego to New York, 8.25 cents.

For the year ending June 30, 1873, there were received in Chicago 1,532,014 barrels of flour, of which only 223,457 were shipped East by lake; 12,724,141 bushels of wheat, of which 8,831,087 bushels were shipped East by lake; 47,366,087 bushels of corn, of which 41,589,508 were shipped East by lake; 15,061,715 bushels of oats, of which 6,370,784 were shipped East by lake: 1,129,086 bushels of rye, of which 231,538 were shipped East by lake; and 5,251,750 bushels of barley, of which 2,330,523 were shipped East by lake. This shows that only the lower-priced cereals are moved in greater amount by lake than rail, except the one instance of wheat; and when to this are added all the live animals, and 144,780 barrels of pork out of 208,664 shipped in that year, it requires not the aid of inspiration to foretell that very soon the lakes will be as powerless to regulate the rate of transportation of vegetable food to the sea-board as the canals will be. When the Erie Canal was completed there was a cheap water-route from all points within reach of the canal or the lakes; but railways have been built parallel with the canals and with the lakes, whose policy is to prevent traffic from reaching these cheap routes, and every new road that is built from the sea-board at any point is, from its very nature, at war with every water-route in the country.

The rate on wheat per bushel, that has obtained for several years from Chicago to New York by rail, is twenty-seven cents in summer when the lakes are open, and thirty-six cents in winter when lake navigation is closed. One of the remedies sought by this bill is the prevention of such unreasonable rates from points where competition half the year indicates what the rate should be. The average rate from the wheat center west of the Mississippi is about eighteen cents per bushel to Chicago or Milwaukee, making the total charge to the sea-board, independent of handling, fifty-four cents; to Liverpool, besides handling at New York, seventy-four cents. Monthly statements of the shipments from Chicago show that shipments in the winter months average the whole year. Of the four hundred millions of bushels of surplus grain, only sixty millions are moved eastwardly from Chicago by lake, and about twenty millions from Milwaukee. Less than three million tons of grain are moved East by our lake system, of the twelve million surplus. The Pennsylvania Railroad moved 7,844,778 tons of all kinds of freight in 1872. The lakes, then, for moving grain, are equal to half such a railroad. From the Mississippi River the average rate, according to tables published on the 1st of January, 1874, computed from five different points, is two cents average per ton per mile, and the lowest class averages eleven mills per ton per mile, while for all intermediate points the rate varies from fourteen to sixteen mills per ton per mile by rail to New York.

Here I desire to call attention to the peculiar hardships imposed on interior non-competing points. The freight rate from the Mississippi, averaging five different points, is eleven mills per ton per mile to New York, a rate of which no one complains; but when five mills more are added on the same class of freights from one of the interior counties that ships one million bushels of grain, the overcharge exceeds all the taxes levied for State, county, township, and municipal purposes. The total levy of 3 per cent. on assessed valuations on any one of these counties is considerably below the excess charged over the rate from the Mississippi to New York; while according to current theories the rate per ton per mile for a long distance should be less than for a short distance.

To be pointed, then, the bill before the House will to a great extent remedy discriminations against non-competing points on the amount of the surplus four hundred million bushels of grain that go to market by rail directly East. The remedy is pointed out by the railroad companies themselves. The railroads from Chicago to the eastern sea-board charge thirty-six cents per bushel for wheat, but the railroads from points west of Chicago, that come into competition with roads running to the lakes, carry to New York for thirty-six cents per bushel; and railroads at the Mississippi, that compete with the river, also carry at thirty-six cents per bushel.

The average rate from the heart of this grain-producing region on the Mississippi to the ocean at New Orleans is about half the rate to New York from April to September; in 1873 the rate averaged eighteen cents per hundred-weight, and was as low as twelve and a half cents.

This indicates very clearly where relief can come from, and a route by which the bulky staples of the Northwest can reach the ocean without costing so much as to prohibit production.

The grain center, especially the wheat center, is rapidly moving westward. The great wheat-raising States are now beyond the Mississippi, and from the nature of the soil the grain center will always in the future be west of the great river. The Southern States will hereafter receive their surplus from States west of the river. The surplus the United States has to spare for Europe must be sent from the same place; the surplus sent to the West Indies also will be found there. All these markets can be reached more readily and with less cost than by rail to New York at present prices. If the railways can carry grain from the Mississippi to the eastern sea-board as cheaply as it can be carried on the river, they will have the item of time in their favor; but there is no reason why the present surplus west of that river, estimated at 47,786,738 bushels by the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, in which estimate Iowa was put 8,000,000 bushels too low, should be compelled to go East by rail.

We have the most extensive railroad system of any country in the world. It has been less interfered with than that of any other country. The accommodations for the carrying of passengers are on a grander scale than those provided for any other people. The enterprise of our railroad men has no parallel in any land. The increase of our miles of railroad is unprecedented; and if the result has been to encourage the various industries of the country by carrying at reasonable rates, with reasonable safety, economy, and expedition, not rendering comparatively useless the natural lines of commerce by discrimination, and not exacting returns for capital never invested, if there is no danger of the growth of corporations whose revenues are greater than those of the Federal Government, then nothing remains to be done but be thankful for the blessings we enjoy. But in view of the complaints that are heard in the East and the West, from our great cities and country towns, from merchant, farmer, and manufacturer, of extortion, discrimination, and inadequacy, the system is either insufficient for the wants of commerce, or we are as a people incapable of gratitude.

While the country was prosperous and the workers of every kind were all employed, the manufacturer finding ready sale for his wares, the appeal of the West for better transportation facilities was not regarded of sufficient importance to attract much attention at the national capital. But when the appeal of the West is echoed by hundreds of thousands of idle men who lack bread and employment, and the great producing West is unable to ship products that are needed in the South, the East, and in Europe, and because these products cannot be shipped the West cannot buy as usual from the East of her wares, then the appeal must be heeded by the representatives of the people, or it may as well be admitted that this great evil is beyond the reach of the people and their representatives.

States have tried to grapple with this question, but it has been beyond the reach of States. Municipalities have endeavored to measure it by the statutes that apply to other persons, but have found that the gauge does not apply. The influence is national, the interest is national, the benefits are national, and the wrongs are national. The railroads of the country extend from the east to the west, and their passage over State lines is no more observed in any respect than their passage over meridians of longitude. Their traffic is national, and if so conducted as to be detrimental to the well-being of the nation, why should not the remedy be national? The people are asking such remedy through their State Legislatures; through political, social, and commercial conventions. It is confined to no class nor occupation; to no State or section, East or West.

The equality of all men before the law was till lately left to the determination of States, but that is now a national question, the solution of which for many years has convulsed the Republic. We are now brought face to face with a question of material interest, the solution of which is looked for at our hands with an interest second only to that which attaches to the question of human rights. Enlightened public opinion demands the one; intelligent public opinion widely expressed requires the other. Some constitutional expounders saw grave difficulities in the way of the solution of the question of human rights, and the same class of men see the same difficulties in the solution of the question of material interest; the same conclusion to which the people pressed in one case is the conclusion at which they desire to arrive now—justice.

The closest scrutiny into all the affairs of Government is being exercised by the people. The expenditure for each Department, the salaries of all officers and employés, the disposition of the public domain, the rate of interest on the public debt, and even the foreign policy of the Government, are generally well understood by the people. Can it be expected that corporations that have become so potential in the Republic, whose past policy and future purposes are blank leaves, and whose acts are so arbitrary as to bear no resemblance to any element in our political economy, shall be longer permitted to dictate the fate of States and the measure of prosperity of millions of people? The increase of salaries less than two millions of dollars has agitated the country as few things have in the present century. But a few men can meet, and by raising the freight on wheat five cents per bushel, take ten times that amount of money from the already distressed producer, and no power known to the laws can forbid.

Relief will be asked from the several States to the extent of their jurisdiction; but that does not go far enough. The corporations that are confined to a State are not the most exacting, although generally operating under greater disadvantages. The through roads are fast absorbing them, and are beyond State jurisdiction. One State cannot look to another for reasonable rates across its territory. One State may be under the control of corporate influence, and decline to require corporations to observe any law. Interference with through railroads, for the interest of both the people and the road, must be comprehensive, and by a power having jurisdiction of its whole length, and power to inquire into all its operations, or the result otherwise will but annoy the railroad and not benefit the people, as the company can charge on through freight sufficient to satisfy them for any local reductions.

From 1863 so 1872 the reduction in the average rate of carrying on eastern railroads was from 2.17 cents to 1.56 cents, or 28 per cent.; but during the same time, on western roads, the reduction has been from 2.32 cents to 2.23 cents, or less than 4 per cent.; this is based on the charges of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and the Illinois Central. Yet the traffic has increased on these roads from 281,228,704 tons moved one mile, in 1863, to 631,912,588 tons moved one mile in 1872, or 142 per cent. These roads have all received very large land grants, very extensive subsidies, and much local aid; but they control, from their initial point to their termini, the country from which they gather the surplus. Competition never has and never will be thought of. They cross the Mississippi, and prevent its use, and will continue to do so unless prevented by law.

One illustration of discrimination against the Mississippi and the interior towns of Iowa: from Davenport to New York by rail, eleven hundred miles, the charge is for wheat sixty cents per hundred-weight, or ten mills per ton per mile; from Iowa City, eleven hundred and fifty miles, the charge is ninety-two cents per hundred-weight, or sixteen mills per ton per mile; from Council Bluffs, fourteen hundred miles, the charge is ninety cents per hundred-weight, or twelve mills per ton per mile. From Iowa City the amount of discrimination is fifteen cents per bushel, or one dollar per mile to the Mississippi for hauling a car of ten tons. This rate of excess is charged from nearly every non-competing station in the State.

Iowa raised, in 1873, thirty-four million bushels of wheat. Estimating five bushels for the consumption of each inhabitant and three million bushels for seed, the State will have twenty-four million bushels to export. Instead of taking fifteen cents as the basis of overcharge, as lower rates fixed at some competing points, if we estimate the excess at twelve cents per bushel, the excess of tariff on this one product equals $2,880,000. Then the State raised, in 1873, one hundred and five million bushels of corn; it cannot be estimated how much of this crop is exported. The crop of 1871 has lain in the cribs until the farmers could increase their stock to consume it, while in one year the crop has decreased forty millions in the State, very much for the reason that it was not a remunerative crop, and as a consequence was neglected. This is easily proved, from the fact that stock-raisers, who never produce corn for the market, had average crops. But the well-known fact that while for the last two years corn could not be shipped from Iowa owing to the high rates of freight, it sold for seventy-five cents to one dollar in the South and East, and the producerrs who were not able to transform it into meat suffered in consequence, is much of the cause of complaint.

The State suffers, however, in the transportation of everything of which corn is the basis. The same rates that are exacted for wheat are the rates charged for moving fat cattle and hogs and for return of heavy merchandise. I have no hesitation in concluding that this one State pays annually for transportation, over the actual value of the labor performed, enough to pay interest on the capital that would construct a freight railroad to the sea-board. But unless some such measure as that now before the House be adopted, a freight railroad would only benefit the locality through which it might pass. The same policy that discriminates against the river and the lakes would discriminate against the Government railroad. No goods could reach it without paying such a penalty as would make it as useless to shippers living fifty miles distant as the Mississippi River is. This has been the order ever since these through railroads were built. The prosperity of the Northwest has been seriously checked. Low-priced crops cannot be profitably cultivated in rotation. Economy enforced by financial distress has been common, especially with men who are opening farms and are not prepared to condense. It will not serve any purpose but that of aggravation to tell the people that overproduction is the cause of the low prices. The excess over the real value of carrying goes into the treasury of the carriers, and while our total export of grain scarcely pays for our hardware bills in England—a country that annually buys three times as much grain as we have to spare—and while the workingmen of the East have to pay too much for everything of which grain is the basis, overproduction will only be presented as an evasive answer by those who are opposed to interfering with the present order, or by those whose interest dictates hostility to any change.

I look upon this as contributing very much to the present depressed financial condition of the country. The Northwest has been the best customer the manufacturing East has had. For several years the Northwest has felt more and more severely the disabilities under which it has been placed from excessive rates for transportation. Its purchasing power has been very much curtailed; perhaps $100,000,000, that would have been expended in improvements mainly, have gone into railroad extensions, and into the various avenues of extravagance so common with that class of men. This has rendered manufacturing unprofitable; hundreds of thousands of men are idle; the industries of the country seem to be paralyzed, while the year 1874 begins with higher freights from the West to the sea-board, and a corresponding depression on the mind of every man in the great West who knows the reward of his toil is wholly to be measured by the directors of the line of railroad upon which he must ship his goods.

Various schemes and methods have been proposed comprehending, in a greater or less degree, the solution of this question. Several States have, in different ways, attempted to regulate the transportation of freight and passengers on railroads. It has been proposed to build railroads as national highways to be operated through a national bureau; it has been proposed to build railroads as national highways over which any person might have a car hauled, or over which any company might run a train by paying toll for the use of the road. Many projects are current looking to the improvement of the various water systems of the country in order to furnish cheap transportation for the heavy staples of the country and bring about competition between carriers—the improvement of the Mississippi and its navigable tributaries, projects to connect the river and lake systems by the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement, by the Rock Island and Hennepin Canal, and by connecting the river system of the Atlantic slope with the river system of the interior through the James River and Kanawha Canal and the Atlantic and Great Western Canal below the freezing line.

Before entering upon the prosecution of a comprehensive improvement of our transportation facilities, either through an improvement of our water-courses or by building Government railroads, it must first be considered how the products of the country are to reach these lines of communication with eastern markets and the sea-board. A road built by the Government, charging reasonable rates, would afford relief to the localities through which it might pass. A road built by private enterprise, under Government charter, would subserve the same end; but if the producers and shippers of the various States have to pay a discriminating penalty upon all freights switched off other lines for the purpose of availing themselves of the reasonable rates charged by the Government road, the amount of which penalty would equal prohibition of its use, then all the benefit derived from such a line of railroad would be by shippers residing immediately upon the line.

A canal dug at the expense of the Government that would charge reasonable rates of freight would encourage production in each locality through which it might be constructed, and be of great benefit to all who could conveniently reach it at either end or any point in its course; but if any intersecting line of transportation charged a rate of tariff that would amount to prohibition of its use, the extent of its benefits would only reach those who could avail themselves of it without first shipping on other lines.

The improvement of the Mississippi River or any of its tributaries, or the improvement of any other rivers of the country, would be an unmixed good; and to the towns and cities situated on their banks, cheaper and better transportation would result; but if any line of transportation that crosses any of our rivers should charge such an increase of rate on all freight proposed to be taken from such lines and shipped upon the rivers as would amount to prohibition, the rivers, notwithstanding any amount of improvement, would only benefit those who could reach their waters without the use of other lines of communication.

The first step to be taken, then, in the solution of the transportation problem, is to make it possible for a shipper to use more than one line of transit without extortion; to make it possible to use both rail and water without excessive penalties; to prevent discrimination against competing points, where it may be desirable to leave one line to take another, to leave the rail for the water, or the water for the rail; to prevent discrimination against non-competing points, where excessive and arbitrary rates on isolated lines prevent the production of many low-priced staples and forbid the establishment of manufactures.

To bring this about will solve the problem as far as the capacity of our present railroads and water-courses is concerned; and to do this there is a distinct field for State legislation and a field beyond the jurisdiction of the several States. Each State can secure reasonable rates on all lines where goods are billed from any point to any other point not outside of its own limits; but when freight is shipped to a market outside of the boundaries of the State, jurisdiction ceases; and the rates of charge are entirely under the control of the carrier, who may grade them to encourage or destroy any branch of industry at any given point.

The great through lines that traverse the Northwest, having their initial point at the lakes or the sea-board, crossing the navigable rivers at right angles, gathering at each station along their lines the crops that can be shipped at the prescribed rate, operate as independently of each other as if competition were a thing unheard of; it is their interest, when freight is once on their lines, that it shall not stop till the end of the line is reached. Cities along the rivers may desire to grind wheat, pack pork, wholesale merchandise, or establish manufactures, but the growth of inland cities, and every species of diversified industry that they might engage in, is encouraged or prohibited, as the interest of the railroad directors dictates.

The railroads were encouraged by grants of land paid for by the people along the lines, each alternate section costing the settler double entry. Right of way, municipal aid, and private assistance were given to an extent never definitely estimated, but sufficient to indicate the good will of the localities through which they passed. The builders were regarded as benefactors; they were largely instrumental in the development of the West; but their roads have mostly passed into the control of directories inaccessible to their patrons; men who apparently fail to comprehend the changes that a few years bring about in an agricultural district; men who fail to encourage the growth of cities along the navigable streams, and who have succeeded by extortion and discrimination in alienating the respect and wholly losing the confidence of all classes of people not dependent upon them.

The result of our great railroad system has been to enrich individuals at the expense of the multitude, to build up great cities at the expense of the country.

The true route to market of any product is the one by which it can go with sufficient safety and expedition for the least cost. And the true cost of transporting any article is the value of the labor necessary to move it. These two principles cover the whole ground, and until they are either observed by carriers voluntarily, or enforced by the Government, the dissatisfaction will increase. It is well known that neither of these principles is being observed at present in the movement of the most of our staples. The Mississippi River is prevented from competing with the railroads that cross it by discriminating rates, and while it is proverbial that river transportation is cheaper than rail, the railroads are the only routes available, and that by their own arrangement.

The bill before the House will remedy this evil; and unless this step is taken, providing for reasonable rates to the Mississippi from any point west or east of it where the merchandise is transported through more than one State, as it will be in winter from most of the great grain and meat producing States, it will give no relief to these States to improve to the utmost either the Mississippi River or the waters which might connect it with the rivers that fall into the lakes, the Gulf, or the Atlantic.

The reason why I press this point repeatedly is that the Mississippi is now the center of the district that produces our surplus grain, and very soon will be east of the center.

Railroads are the means of gathering the surplus crops throughout the Northwest, and must of necessity continue to be such, whether such surplus finds its way to the sea-board by the great trunk lines, or by the lake or river systems. The best interests of the whole country would be subserved if the principles of economy were as regularly observed in this movement as the principles of gravitation are in the natural movement of matter; but the present practices not only violate natural and philosophic laws, but trench upon the equitable, vested rights of the people. For example, when the citizens gave franchise, right of way, and perhaps $3,000 per mile donation for the express and understood purpose of reaching competing rail and water routes by a branch road, and their object is thwarted by the directories of a great trunk line obtaining possession of it and diverting it from its original purpose, is it cause of astonishment if the people consider their vested right antecedent to that of any one else?

The systems of water-routes have been ignored by the railroads ever since they were constructed. Did all the railroad lines stop at the Mississippi, the shipper who could reach the river would have choice of routes, as the commerce of the lakes has choice to the sea-board of canal or rail; and the low rates obtaining on eastern railroads might be imitated; and the same would be the case with railroads when they are extended to any of our rivers. But the railroads having crossed the Mississippi, or any of its navigable tributaries, and entered into the great grain districts beyond, carefully arrange, by discriminating rates, to haul everything as far on their lines as possible. The consequence of this practice has substantially resulted in removing the Northwest as much farther from market as the rates paid for moving any staple are greater than would be paid if the article were permitted to seek a market by the nearest and cheapest route. For example, when corn at the sea-board sells for sixty cents per bushel, and the rate is fifty cents by rail, that point is so far remote from market by rail as to prohibit the shipment of corn; and if the rate is as low as corn can be carried for, then all such points are too remote to export that cereal, but if the rate charged is double that which corn can be moved for, then the extortion virtually places such points twice their natural distance from market.

But if the discriminating practice of railroads prevents the use of water-routes, whereon freight might be carried for half the rates exacted by them, then the result of the extension of our railroad system has been to refuse to gather for the water-routes that might carry at half the railroad rates, after having prohibited shipments on their own lines.

The practical effect of the committee's bill will be to make collecting agents of the railroads for the water-routes; and without this both railroads and water-routes are of little value to a large majority of the people of the Northwest.

It is very remote from the present policy of the railroads to enter upon any policy so apparently detrimental to their interests, but I am confident that the result would be such an increase in all the staples of the West that the railroads would derive much more profit than they do now.

Under the present rule, at a given distance from the eastern sea-board the shipment of cheap breadstuffs ceases; and, consequently, in a corresponding degree, the production; and while the privilege of condensing still remains, the producer of moderate means cannot avail himself of it. The young man who has been advised to "go West" needs time to prepare for transition from the production of raw materials to the production of manufactured articles. The continuation of the present practice will continue the present grievances. The loss to the country is not only the excess of charge on what is exported, but on the general paralysis that has stricken all the industries of the far West. From the Mississippi, the distance to the sea indicates the river route as the cheapest; but from the Missouri, there is no comparison in distance to the permanently open river and the Atlantic. Still, all that country within the reach of each railroad is compelled to ship directly East, because it is the interest of the roads that traffic should go East. The economic transportation of the staples of that vast expanse of fertile country to market is never thought of, and rates unless the bill before the House looking to the fixing of reasonable should become law, the directory of one through railroad can, as in the past, control the industries of a strip of territory forty miles wide, across the continent, as far as the railroads may have extended. The Missouri River country is comparatively new and unoccupied. It is the finest on the continent, as a wheat-growing district, both as regards soil and climate. Its growth under the present practice is impossible. True, poor men may exist there, but cannot prosper. The Missouri River is greatly superior to Russian rivers that float the wheat to tide-water that comes into competition with our wheat in England, but the present railroad policy prevents the use of the Missouri, and when it reaches the Mississippi discrimination prevents its use.

Farming is but in its incipient stages in the West; but a fraction of the soil is under cultivation, and but few have had the time to study out a system of harmony among the departments of the farm, or the means to institute and successfully carry on to demonstration experiments that will result in economy of labor, increase of fertility, and steady profit. Of the States that border on the great river one acre in four only is cultivated. From the one-fourth that are cultivated, by rotation of crops, grazing, fallowing, draining, and an intelligent reduction of the details of farming into agricultural science, double the present results will be reached.

From 1860 to 1873 the shipment of wheat from Russia to England has been 238,343,547 bushels; from the United States to England 274,657,182 bushels. The ocean freight from the Baltic is about forty cents per bushel, and from the Black Sea about fifty cents, while from New York it averages about twenty cents per bushel. But an inquiry into the means used to transfer grain to the sea-board will illustrate the disadvantages under which we compete with Russia. We use the rail almost exclusively from the field to the sea-board, the greater part of our surplus being moved during the winter when the lakes and canals are frozen, or in late autumn when water-rates and insurance are high, or by railroads that do not connect with lake or canal, and that carefully discriminate against our navigable rivers. Wheat shipped from Odessa and Taganrog, ports that rival New York in the volume of their wheat exports, is floated down the Dnieper, the Dniester, and the Don, from the richest fields in interior Russia, at a cost consequent upon water transportation. The railroad system of Russia does not seem to interfere with their mode of reaching the sea-board with bulky products. The Vistula is as much used to carry wheat to Dantzic as it was before railroads penetrated into the interior.

If the Russian farmer had to reach the sea-board at a rate equaling that exacted from the trans-Mississippi farmer, with his antiquated machinery and methods of husbandry, he would not be formidable as a competitor; but the one advantage of cheap water communication more than balances the skilled labor and ingenious appliances whereby the time of one man in our harvest fields accomplishes more than a dozen in theirs. The river system of Russia is insignificant compared with ours, yet the persistent use of this mode of transportation enables them to compete successfully with us in the grain markets of Europe, and when they shall have adopted our implements of husbandry, our gang-plows, seeders, harvesters, and thrashers, then, unless we can reach the nearest navigable river, lake, or canal, at a reasonable rate of tariff, we will be shut out of the markets of the world. This is not pleasant to contemplate with a balance of trade of $100,000,000 annually against us. That could easily be met by increased exports, provided no discrimination hindered our grain from going to market by the nearest water-route.

A careful estimate of the surplus cereals of the Northwest, that are grown in localities nearer the open Mississippi than the lakes, will show that two hundred million bushels can be moved cheaper by the river that now are moved directly East by rail, or wait till the opening of navigation for transportation by lake and canal, or are sent to New Orleans by rail, as grain now is from Central Iowa. The bill before the House contemplates the possibility of reaching the river in winter at reasonable rates on any railroad running in that direction. If this one point is accomplished, provision will be made for future increase as well as competition with the lake and rail system.

I have shown that the rate from any part of the grain-fields of the State of Iowa to Chicago is very nearly the same; two hundred miles here or there apparently make no difference. The rate, from fifty miles west of the Mississippi to the Missouri, varies very little. If this rate even (about eighteen cents per bushel) was charged to Saint Louis, the surplus for the Southern States could reach the consumer at greatly reduced cost by river and Gulf. We have seen that the South requires eighty million bushels. The one hundred millions that we now export to foreign countries could reach their markets at half the present rates, while the surplus needed in the Eastern States could also be moved much cheaper.

We must anticipate the growth of the East and her annually increasing deficit. We must anticipate the growth of the South, the growth of villages where her cotton will be manufactured, the opening of her mines, whose development will annually require larger quantities of grain, and we should arrange for, as well as anticipate, direct shipments of grain to the West Indies, instead of first shipping it to Liverpool.

We have choice of two results: either make the present avenues of commerce subserve the wants of the people of the Northwest in this respect and reanimate her crippled industries, or wait till the machinery that makes exports of grain possible is in use in Russia; and not only will we be driven from European markets, but the day may come when Boston can get wheat cheaper from Odessa than Omaha. Look at the figures. In 1872 we exported twenty-four million bushels of wheat, excluding imported wheat, which was over two million bushels—just what Iowa has to spare in 1873. It is true the export was greater in 1873 by twelve million bushels for the year ending June 30, but this is owing to the very grievance the bill before the House seeks to remedy. Corn would not bear all-rail transportation, or even rail and water, at the rates current in 1872 and 1873 from beyond the Mississippi. Its production declined two hundred million bushels in the ten States of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska from 1872 to 1873. Corn is now worth fifty cents per bushel in Iowa for home consumption, which scarcity will in the coming year reduce the wheat surplus; it costs the shipper eighty cents per bushel to send wheat to Boston, including handling, from west of the Mississippi. Even at present rates by ocean it would only cost seventy cents to ship wheat from Odessa to Boston. Two millions of acres raise our surplus wheat; two millions of acres would raise it in Russia. Give the Russians our machinery, and I see nothing to prevent them from selling wheat in Boston.

It is surely desirable that we, as a nation, sell as much as we buy. Reduction of rates of carriage will increase production in proportion as tariffs are lowered; and even if it be necessary to admit that all the reduction would inure to the benefit of the consumer at home—as it cannot affect the English market, that annually requires three times the amount of our total export—the producer would buy the wares of the manufacturer at a lower price whose workman now pays too much for his bread and meat on account of high rates of freight.

The Northwest is just beginning to develop her capacity to produce beef and pork, and dairy products. What is to be the future? The people have waited long and patiently. They modestly ask of Congress to see that fair and reasonable rates are charged. They do not regard with any hostility any enterprise being prosecuted by any citizen. They have no more desire to destroy their railroads than they have to destroy their children. They have nourished both through much self-denial and great expense, after having given life to the latter and franchise to the former. Their joy at the construction of the one has been only exceeded by their pride at the birth of the other.

No people in the world tax themselves so heavily as the people of the Northwestern States to educate; no people in America have contributed so liberally to build railroads. They hope that careful, though expensive, education will develop and ripen in the West the best youth of American growth. They have hoped that the full development of the railroad system would bring them nearer market and regulate itself by competition. As regards distance from market, we might as well be one thousand miles further from it as be compelled to pay prices that would carry our products double the present distance; and as regards competition, prices are only depressed at one point that they may be raised at another.

I believe that in the business of carrying by rail are to be found not only our most enterprising citizens, but that many of them are fair-minded men, who perhaps would, and doubtless in many cases do, content themselves with reasonable charges; but it will readily be seen that the temptation to extortion is very great where unlimited power is given, and the compensation for the labor performed does not come under the law of supply and demand. Railroad men individually—many of them—deplore the unhappy situation, but assert that any one company is powerless to reform. The owners of western lines live in eastern cities, and are beyond the reach of their patrons. The caprice of a freight superintendent may prohibit the production of some article valuable in well-ordered husbandry, and the husbandman can only turn in sorrow to the cultivation of something that will bear transportation, and recognize, while he suffers, that there is no remedy.

The common law does indeed provide a remedy, and redress has been had, and damages have been collected; but it has generally required a decade of years, and is quite beyond the reach of common men. The bill before the House provides for a commission to make schedules that shall be prima facie evidence of fairness; it will be incumbent on the corporation to prove the unreasonableness of the schedules, instead of on the individual. If the bill becomes a law, then it will be possible for the shipper to stop at any river and float down to salt water; then the east and west railroads will be required to carry to north and south roads that run to any of our contemplated canals or improved rivers; the trans-Missouri country can use the east and west railroads to reach any of the navigable tributaries of the Mississippi; the Missouri can be utilized as the Dnieper, the Dniester, the Don, the Vistula, and the Volga are now utilized in Russia, to float the future products of that great valley to the Mississippi. Iowa, Missouri, and Minnesota can have choice of routes to the Mississippi, the lakes, or the sea-board, and can reach the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, or the Rock River Canal, or float up the Ohio and reach the James River and Kanawha Canal when completed, or go farther down the Mississippi and ship on the Tennessee, the Cumberland, or any system of water communication that may be developed as now asked for by Southern States. But without this primary step none of these projects will ever be of more than local benefit; the through railroads will arrange their schedules to discriminate against all such routes, or against any railroad leading to them.

Belgium has one mile of railroad to six of area; England and Wales one to five; the United States one to fifty. We have seventy-five thousand miles of railroad now, and when our system is as complete as that of England and Wales we will have seven hundred and thirty thousand miles. Taken as a whole, the United States is, from an agricultural point of view, much the richer country; if our mines are to be considered, there is no comparison. The revenues of fifty-four thousand miles of our railroad system exceed $478,000,000.

The influence of the owners and directors heretofore, in controlling the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of Government, is painfully apparent from the investigations had concerning the management of the Erie directory. The extent to which the people are compelled to pay interest on fictitious stock is well illustrated by the New York Central. It seems to be high time that Congress, the only power having jurisdiction over the whole, should inaugurate a wholesome restraint over this interest, that is so powerful in its incipiency as to defy interference.

We have one mile of railroad to five hundred and forty-seven people. He who controls a line from the sea-board to the Missouri, controls the carrying interests of seven hundred and sixty-five thousand eight hundred of our citizens; and the tendency of the system is to unity of control. Does the history of the East India Company, or the monopolies granted by Queen Elizabeth, furnish greater evidence of exclusive right to tax than the more than royal prerogative exercised by fifty of our fellow-citizens?

The sacred rights of the people must not be forgotten while we proclaim the sacred rights of capital. The accumulations of old States are as necessary to assist in building up the industries of new States as the labor of the pioneer; but when the conduct of capitalists is such as to render labor unremunerative, conservatism need not wonder if legislation, new to our statutes, is needed to cure evils new to the calendar of human wrongs.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to detain the House at this late hour; but as this is probably the only opportunity I shall get to say anything upon the bill reported by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY,] I avail myself of this occasion to briefly express my views.

Mr. Speaker, in my opposition to this bill I do not pretend to decry or belittle the importance of the subject. I freely concede to it all the magnitude that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] has stated it possesses. I believe it to be one of the most important that ever claimed the attention of Congress. I may here say that my record as a member of this House, and before I became a member of it, has not been one of sympathy with the railroads of the country. I cannot be accused in my short political life of ever having said or done anything in favor of railroad corporations or corporations of any kind as against the interests of the people. I think no gentleman can say that any vote of mine while I have been a member of this House has indicated any such disposition upon my part. If I cannot support the bill which the learned gentleman from Iowa has introduced, it is because the Constitution which I have taken an oath to support gives no warrant for the enactment of such a measure as this.

Mr. Speaker, the desirableness of an object is never the measure of its constitutionality. A thing may be very desirable, and yet no warrant may exist for it in the Constitution. It is desirable, for instance, that all men should be temperate and moral; yet who believes that this House would undertake to pass a law which would enforce the virtue of temperance or morality upon the people of the country? It is desirable that all men should be educated; we all believe that ignorance is an evil; yet this House has declared over and over again that Congress does not possess the power to impose upon the States even a system of education. Hence, I say, that the desirableness of an object can never be a measure of its constitutional sanction, nor an argument for its adoption, if it has no warrant in the Constitution.

It was said by the Supreme Court, in an important case reported in 12 Peters, page 657, that in the construction of the Constitution we must look to the history of the times and examine the state of things when it was framed and adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will admit that in one point of view this argument may not appear to have great force as against this bill. Gentlemen have well said that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution such a thing as a railroad or a steamboat was of course unknown, and therefore no such thing could have been within the purview of the framers of the Constitution. Yet, nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I contend that construing the Constitution with reference to the circumstances of the then existing times, no warrant can be found for the legislation now asked at the hands of this House.

What was the great difficulty which the framers of the Constitution sought to remedy when in 1787 they entered upon the work of framing the organic law under which we now live? It was the fact that different States had passed conflicting legislative enactments by which the commerce of the country had been nearly ruined. It was in such a disordered condition that the people of the country felt a strong necessity for a surrender by the States of the entire control over this question of commerce and the vesting of jurisdiction over that question in some general head or central authority. This was the great necessity felt at that time. We must, as I contend, consider the question, what were the evils at that time proposed to be remedied by constitutional enactment? They were nothing more nor less than the difficulties growing out of conflicting legislation of the different States in regard to the imposition of duties upon imports and exports to and from the different States of the Union.

The history of those times will bear me out in saying that this subject of charges for the carrying of either passengers or freight had never entered into the minds of the people at that time. Because there were then no railroads and no steamboats, it does not follow that there were not such things as common carriers. We had then our ocean commerce, our coastwise commerce, and our interstate commerce—our inland trade—just as we have such commerce and trade now. These subjects were constantly engaging the attention of public men in those days; yet there cannot be shown any act, any argument, any decision of a court, or any statement of any public man of those times, giving even a semblance of authority to this proposed legislation.

There are three provisions in the Constitution relating to this subject, from which I take it the gentleman from Iowa and those who take the same view of the subject as he does must derive the supposed authority for the passage of this bill.

It is provided in the first place that—

> Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

This was a general grant of power to Congress over this whole subject.

But in the ninth section of the same article there is this further provision, which is a restriction upon the power previously granted:

> No tax shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

Thus literally curtailing or limiting the power granted in the previous section by at least one-half.

The next clause provides that—

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Now, these are the three provisions of the Constitution relating to that subject, and who that will read them, study them, and study the comments upon the Constitution by approved writers, will not say that what the framers of the Constitution then had in view, when they used this language, was simply the regulation of commerce as to duties? In support of that view Mr. Madison, who was the most influential and the most active member, if we except Alexander Hamilton, in that convention, in a letter that he wrote to Mr. Monroe, said at that time:

> Much indeed is it to be wished, as I conceive, that no regulations of trade, that is to say, no restrictions on imports whatever, were necessary.

To Washington, in 1787, he wrote:

> The national Government should be armed with positive and complete authority in all cases which require uniformity, such as the regulation of trade, including the right of taxing both exports and imports.

To Jefferson, in 1787:

> The line of distinction between the power of regulating trade and that of drawing revenue from it, which was once considered the barrier of our liberties, was found on fair discussion to be absolutely undefinable. Some contended for an unlimited power over trade, including exports as well as imports.

More than thirty years afterward President Monroe, who had also taken an active part in the discussions on this question, maintained in an elaborate document, that the sense in which the power was understood and exercised by the States was doubtless that in which it was transferred to the United States.

> The sense in which the power was understood and exercised by the States was doubtless that in which it was transferred to the United States. * * * Commerce between independent powers and communities is universally regulated by duties and imposts. It was so regulated by the States before the adoption of the Constitution, equally in respect to each other and to foreign powers. The goods and vessels employed in the trade are the only subjects of regulation. It can act on none other.. A power, then, to impose such duties and imposts in regard to foreign nations, and to prevent any on the trade between the States, was the only power granted.

In the same document President Monroe, referring to the earlier propositions for regulation of commerce, said:

> Those of 1784, '85, '86, and '87, leading step by step to the adoption of the Constitution, had in view only the obtaining of a power to enable Congress to regulate trade with foreign powers. It is manifest that the regulation of trade with the several States was altogether a secondary object, suggested by and adopted in connection with the other. In entire harmony with this the authors of the Federalist called the power to regulate commerce between the States a "supplemental provision." They said that without this supplemental provision the great and essential power of regulating foreign commerce would have been incomplete and ineffectual.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in reading the history of the times I will take it upon myself to say that no authority can be found under the clause to regulate commerce among the States for saying we have the right to go the monstrous length of providing what shall be the charges that a railroad may make for the transportation of passengers or of goods. And I am glad to know that I am relieved of the necessity for any extended argument on the constitutional view of this question, because that has been already done to my hand by the learned argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] in which, I think, he clearly shows that this never was within the intention of the framers of the Constitution.

Now, then, to regulate commerce, means what? It has been said by Chief Justice Story, in his learned commentaries on the Constitution, that it meant to prescribe the rules by which commerce was to be governed. And when we use the expression there is at once raised in the mind of every man an idea of a rule; that is, a rule which has in it the idea of uniformity. The idea was to establish a rule or a plan by which certain things may be governed. Now, to regulate the price of freight would be to establish a rule for every different railroad in the country. I have not had time to ascertain how many railroads in the country would fall under the operation of the bill of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] but it is safe to say there would be several hundred of them.

Now, what rule could be established governing the freights of three or four or five hundred railroads in this country, in every one of which the question of freight would depend upon, probably, a hundred different circumstances? The sparseness of population, the grade of the road, and thousands of different circumstances which you could well imagine, would all govern and settle this question of freight. And yet we would be asked to regulate commerce and to prescribe rules for it by a commission of nine men, when you would be required to have as many different rules for the regulation of commerce—if that is what you mean by the regulation of commerce—as there are railroads in the country.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is an unfortunate proposition coming from the West at this time. Now that they are complaining about the want of capital and currency in that part of the country, they come here into this House and ask us to pass a law which would more effectually throttle western improvements and western enterprise than any other proposition that could be introduced. I do not know anything that would more prevent the investment of capital in the western country from the East than the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa. And it is a well-known fact—I do not suppose that it is disputed—that it is to the railroads that the West owes almost all its greatness and prosperity at the present day. And I believe that it is just as little disputed that those railroads have been built up in a great measure by the capital of the East. And now that they have got their railroads, it ill becomes the West to turn around and say to the East, "Do not bring your capital here; do not invest it in western railroads; if you do you will go away without any dividends or any profits." I say at this time, when the great want of the West and the Southwest is capital, for them to come here and ask us to put all the capital of the country at the mercy of nine irresponsible individuals, nothing could be introduced into this House that could more effectually kill and destroy all enterprise in railroad building.

I cannot imagine what has caused this sudden change in the minds of our friends from the West. Not more than three years ago they were here in this House, as I know well, and could not get railroads enough. They demanded land grants for railroads. The Representatives from Minnesota, one of whom I see before me, from Iowa and Kansas, could not get railroads enough; but a change has come over the spirit of their dreams, and all at once they have seemed to think that the greatest curse in the country is railroads.

Now, I differed with these gentlemen in the last Congress on this question. I did not think it the most desirable thing for them, and I especially fought the proposition to give to these railroads large grants of land. But if the western people are now prepared to turn round and say that they will kill the goose that laid the golden egg, they may do so; I shall not be a party to the transaction. I believe these railroads have done much for the West, and I am surprised that a proposition, coming from western men, should be introduced into the House, which would destroy, in a measure, all railroad building in the West while this measure should remain a law upon the statute-book, should it ever get there.

If, Mr. Speaker, I could bring my mind to the conclusion that this bill had any warrant in the Constitution for its enactment, there would be another objection to it as serious and grave as it would be possible to conceive of against any bill. It is well known to-day that one of the greatest difficulties on this whole subject is the power which railroad corporations have over legislative bodies. It is difficult now for the thirty-seven different Legislatures of the Union and Congress to circumvent the grasping tendencies of these soulless and heartless corporations; but when you take away from those thirty-seven States, and take away from ourselves, all control over this important subject and place it in the hands of nine men, I cannot conceive of any more monstrous proposition. We might well say, quis custodiet ipsos custodes—who shall guard the guards themselves?

Mr. Speaker, I have just as much faith in man as the history of fallen humanity compels me to place in him—no more and no less; and I say that this is placing in the hands of a few men powers and responsibilities that I am unwilling to assent to. If it is difficult now, with all our various State Legislatures and with Congress, to circumvent and control the grasping tendencies of these corporations, what will be the effect when the whole subject is placed under the control of nine men?

I do not believe the gentleman from Iowa, if he could pass this bill and get his nine commissioners appointed to carry it out, would gain the object for which I believe he is honestly and sincerely laboring. I do not think he would attain his point, because it is just placing those men in a position where they would be subject to influences and temptations which I believe even an angel from heaven would hardly be able to resist and withstand.

I believe in controlling these corporations and keeping them within proper limits, and I do not deny that our authority goes to the extent of saying to a railroad running from one State into another, or running through two or more States, that they shall make no discrimination against the commerce of another State. I believe we have full authority for that; but that is quite a different thing from saying what shall be the schedule of freights for railroads. I do not believe a railroad beginning in Chicago and ending in New York City, has any right, in order to destroy the trade of Philadelphia, to carry goods cheaper to New York than to Philadelphia, so as to throw the trade into the latter city; but it is a monstrous proposition that we may say what a railroad shall charge for carrying freight from Chicago to New York, and there is no authority in the Constitution for it. As well might you say what they shall pay their engineers, and what dividends they shall strike, because really the dividends of railroad companies are struck from the surplus earnings; and if you have the right to say what their earnings shall be, you strike at the dividends. I believe the gentleman from Iowa will not say that either of these positions is tenable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in my desultory way I have said a few things merely to indicate my views on this subject; not that I have no sympathy with the object the gentleman from Iowa has in view; not that I am indifferent to this great question; but only because I believe after all we must place it where it belongs. If the States do not take up the question and legislate upon it and control it, I do not see what authority we have over it.

My own State has recently adopted, by a very large majority, a constitution which has been pronounced to be the best in the Union, and that constitution places all corporations doing business in the State within the grasp of the people, and puts them completely under the control of the people. I hope the time will soon come when the other States of the Union will take action on this subject as Pennsylvania has done; and when they do so, I believe there is a remedy applicable to this case, and within the provisions of the Constitution, that will avoid the great corruption that would be introduced if we should pass the bill of the gentleman from Iowa, and which would be equitable and fair as well to the corporations as to the people.

[Mr. MCNULTA addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MCCRARY. If no other gentleman wishes to be heard to-night, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ADAMS: The petition of Andrew Yates, a soldier of the war of 1812, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

Also, the petition of John S. Friend, a soldier of the war of 1812, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Jackson County, Kentucky, for a pension to the minor children of John Jones, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Samuel M. Reynolds, late brevet lieutenant-colonel and paymaster United States volunteers, to be allowed a credit for money stolen from him while paymaster, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BURCHARD: The petition of D. A. Knowlton, Jacob Krohn, and 54 others, merchants, bankers, and business men of Freeport, Illinois, deprecating further inflation of the currency, and asking that the United States notes issued out of the so-called reserve may be withdrawn from circulation as speedily as possible, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. COBURN: A memorial of a meeting of business men of Indianapolis, Indiana, asking for an increase of the currency by law of Congress, and prompt action in the premises, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. COX: The memorial of the New York Academy of Medicine in favor of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CRUTCHFIELD: The petition of William Clift, of Chattanooga, Tennessee, for compensation for services as recruiting officer, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Tennessee, for the survey and improvement of the Hiwassee River from its mouth to the "Savannah Farm," or Mountain Pass, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HAMILTON: The petition of 260 citizens of New Jersey, for the free transportation by mail of newspapers within the county of their publication, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HARRISON: Additional testimony to accompany House bills Nos. 638 and 639, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LAWSON: Memorials of the New York Academy of Medicine, Medical Library and Journal Association of New York, and Medical Society of the County of New York, in support of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McCRARY: The memorial of citizens of the District of Columbia, in relation to drainage and sewerage in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, to the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MacDOUGALL: The memorial of the New York Academy of Medicine, in support of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of William Hoffman, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Mercy E. Scattergood, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, widow of Edward Scattergood, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POTTER: The memorial of the New York Academy of Medicine, in support of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of Charles T. Campbell, of Dakota Territory, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. E. H. ROBERTS: The petition of citizens of Rome, New York, for the repeal of that portion of the act of June 6, 1872, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. in certain duties, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SENER: Several petitions of citizens of Virginia, for an appropriation for the improvement of Quantico Creek and Neabsco Creek and Bay, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of G. R. Brandon, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WALLS: Papers relating to the claim of Robert H. Watts, of Warrington, Florida, to the Committee on War Claims.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 7, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read in part, when,

On motion of Mr. FRYE, the further reading of the Journal was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

FINANCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair.) The House, pursuant to order, meets to-day as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 262) to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches and on bank-checks. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the remarks which I intend to present to the House to-day for its consideration, were prepared immediately after the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means delivered his speech upon the finances of the country, which has attracted so much attention in Congress and out of it. My attention has been so continuously devoted to the duties of the committee of which I am a member that I have not had time to further continue the line of discussion which the speech of that gentleman invited.

Before proceeding, however, to present these views, I wish to occupy the attention of the House for a short while, in referring to two speeches which have been made within a few days in answer to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] one by my colleague from the Oneida district, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] and one by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

My colleague, in accordance with his temperament, presents a very placid and agreeable view of the public exigencies. He is satisfied with the condition of the public Treasury, with the disbursements which are made, and with his own estimate of the probable revenue to meet any possible deficiency. In this regard, like his own individual character, he is a contented, happy man. He sees no difficulty in the way; and in the figures he presents—no doubt carefully drawn, and I am not prepared to say not accurately presented—a justification from his stand-point of the degree of agreeableness with which he views the aspect of public affairs.

There is, however, one very remarkable statement made by that gentleman to which I desire to refer. It is to be found in his speech, page 16 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, in which he refers to what he calls "the actual situation." He says:

> In a word, the revenues are now ample to meet every accruing obligation. If they were not I would not look to the future for a remedy, but would now cry "tax."

According to his figures and according to his sanguine view of the revenues of the country, he deems them ample. Ample for what? Ample to meet every accruing liability of the Government. But if they are not so, that is, if our receipts are not equal to our expenditures, then he is for taxation. Did it never occur to that gentleman that there was another way, and that is by a reduction of obligations?

Sir, in my judgment, if we fall short of a sufficient revenue to meet the accruing obligations of the Government, our first duty is to decrease those obligations within the limits of our revenue, and the last measure to which, in the present condition of the industries of the country, we should have resort is to that of additional burdens in the way of taxation on the industries of the people. Therefore, sir, I beg respectfully, without measuring words with my colleague as to his estimation of the facts, to take issue with him whether we should resort to taxation until we have tried my first remedy, and that is a reduction of the expenditures of the Government.

But, sir, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations addressed the House on the same subject a day or two ago, and I notice his speech only because it emanates from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. If that gentleman held an ordinary position on this floor, the same as other members do, I would not consume the time of the House by making any reference whatever to his remarks. He advances a very extraordinary theory. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 6, page 25. He says:

> The necessary expenditures of the Government form the base line from which we measure the amount of our taxation required, and on which we base our system of finance. We have frequently heard it remarked since the session began that we should make our expenditures come within our revenues—that we should "cut our garment according to our cloth." This theory may be correct when applied to private affairs, but it is not applicable to the wants of nations.

Why not, sir? Why not? Do not the same principles of political economy govern the humblest individual in the ordinary transactions of life as govern the greatest and most powerful nation in the conduct of its affairs? If a merchant, or a lawyer, or a trader, or a manufacturer, or a farmer, finds himself curtailed in his receipts, what is his first thought? What is his first duty? It is to bring those expenditures within the limitation of the resources. It is, in short, in the language of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to cut his garment according to his cloth, and not to spend $15,000 when his income is only $10,000. But the gentleman rejects that theory, and says that while it may be a proper principle to apply to an individual it will not do to apply it to this Government. Of course not. Why should he desire to apply it to this Government? He wants the expenditures, with the exception of the curtailment of a few thousand dollars, to go on, and to lift up the resources of the Government by taxation on the people to meet them. An individual will reduce his expenses to meet his income; but he is for keeping up the expenses whatever the consequence. If the total expenditures be $310,000,000 or $320,000,000 one year, and by any extravagance, or profligacy, or necessary expenditures they are increased to $350,000,000 the next year, he would raise, either by taxation or borrowing, that $350,000,000. He does not tell you exactly by what means he would do it, but the necessary logical inference from his speech is that he must resort to one or the other of these expedients. He reverses the sound political maxim applicable to the individual as well as to the nation. Now, sir, as to that gentleman's practice, I refer to it only because he seeks credit for a desire of economy. In the last bill reported by him from the Committee on Appropriations, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, I find several important items in which he proposes an increased expenditure. I will cite some of them:

Purpose.	Appropriated, 1873-'74.	Recommended, 1874-'75.
For United States mints and assay offices	$762,180 00	$1,026,240 00
For Territories and the District of Columbia	244,480 00	257,067 00
For the office of Secretary of the Interior, including contingent expenses of building occupied by Interior Department	134,100 00	170,340 00
For General Land Office, including contingent	244,560 00	254,560 00
For Indian Office, including contingent	68,140 00	73,680 00
For Bureau of Education, including contingent	34,850 00	35,510 00
For Post-Office Department, including contingent	479,382 00	486,312 00
For United States courts, district attorneys, marshals, &c	379,850 00	401,750 00

I quote from the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, pages 69 and 70, showing that he proposes a very large and, in my judgment, a very unnecessary increased expenditure.

The Navy bill that came from that committee, in addition to the $4,000,000 which we had appropriated previously, made a much larger increased expenditure for the Navy Department for the coming fiscal year than the expenditure for the last fiscal year; and that bill comes back from the Senate amended by a further increase, which his committee, I am informed, will agree to.

I will digress for the purpose of objecting to the habit of the Senate in adding to our appropriation bills. In one instance now within my mind the Senate went so far as to add between six and seven million dollars upon an appropriation bill sent from this House. Sir, the English House of Commons would not permit that. The House of Peers would not dare to amend an appropriation bill originating in the House of Commons. When the Washington commission recently sat here for the settlement of our Alabama claims, Sir Stafford Northcote, the present chancellor of the exchequer of England under the Disraeli administration, was astonished when he came to understand that the Senate exercised the power of moneyed amendments to appropriation bills originating in this House. He said he had never known such an instance in English history; and in his judgment the House of Commons would send back such an additional appropriation with indignation to the House of Peers. As extravagant, and, in my judgment, wasteful, as this House often is in appropriating public money, not only in the regular appropriation bills, but in the many other appropriations we are continually making, the Senate goes much farther in giving no consideration to the moneyed interests of the country.

Now, sir, I shall proceed with remarks directly pertinent to the speech of Mr. DAWES. He has chosen to select this as the opportune occasion to discuss the general wants of the Treasury, and the proper course which, in his judgment, should be pursued in order to create a more approximate equality between the receipts and disbursements. He has thus chosen to give this discussion a broader scope than is comprehended in the question immediately before us, and in this regard I shall attempt to follow him. For the purpose of presenting in a few words what were the substantial points of that gentleman's speech, I group them as follows:

First. The present and prospective resources of the Government.

Secondly. Means to provide for the alleged deficiency.

Thirdly. A reference to the past extravagance in order to deter Congress and the Administration from like errors.

These, I believe, comprehend the leading points of the speech, to which I propose to say a few words in reply.

Let me premise by calling attention to the analogy between the American House of Representatives and the English House of Commons. Our legislative system, as is well known, was founded on that of England. Our Senate is the House of Lords. This House is the popular branch represented by the persons chosen by the electors, as the House of Commons. It is true our Cabinet ministers do rarely appear in propria persona on the floor of the House, as in the House of Commons, but their representatives do, especially as to the public finances. In England, the chancellor of the exchequer, the chief officer of the treasury, sits in the House of Commons to explain and defend the management of his portfolio, while with us that officer, the Secretary of the Treasury, is represented by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who has access to the most private of the Treasury archives, and is, by virtue of his position, the exclusive representative of that officer. Therefore, when that gentleman rises here to inform the House upon these questions, he must be accepted as a mouth-piece of the Government itself.

But in this case we have an additional high authority. He is not only the representative of the ministry, but the leading and most influential member of the dominant party in the House, exercising a potent influence over all questions, and having more power to influence legislation than any other, or any dozen other, of the leading men. Being the oldest member in point of continued service, and for many years chairman of the two great leading committees, a man of conceded ability, a ready and forcible debater, he has had for ten years a commanding power over the proceedings of this House. Thus clothed with authority, when that gentleman speaks, we should listen; when he counsels, we should heed; and when he castigates, we should take admonition. But of him to whom much is given much will be required; and if he in turn shall be held responsible for many of the evils of which he complains, I am sure he will not object. Nor would I impose upon him an undivided responsibility. He and the administration of General Grant are but the representatives of their party—the republican party of the country—and it is that party more than the able chairman, through the aid and support of its members in Congress, that has accomplished the unjustifiable measures to which he has referred, and which he has so justly and severely criticised. Therefore, I hope I may not be considered as attempting to introduce merely partisan considerations in discussing a measure of this character, if I shall attempt to hold up to the condemnation of the country those intrusted with power, and who have had the responsibility of the conduct of this Government for the last thirteen years.

Now, a word as to the gentleman's figures. That part of his speech which is devoted to an exposé of the condition of the public Treasury I am bound to assume as strictly accurate. What he says in detail of the receipts and expenditures during the present fiscal year cannot be questioned. Taking the total amount of appropriations asked for for the next fiscal year as the probable amount that will be allowed, he proceeds to state what, in his judgment and that of the Treasury Department, will be the probable deficiency under existing laws. Without following the details by which he reaches the conclusion, and assuming the conclusion accurate, what can be said of the conclusion itself? He tells us that there will be a probable balance in the Treasury at the close of the year of $20,302,385, as against $60,000,000 with which the Government began the year; and, further, he goes on to show that even this small balance of $20,000,000 will probably be drawn against for other liabilities, making about $7,600,000 more, until finally he concludes that we cannot possibly expect a larger balance at the close of the year than about $10,000,000.

When asked, by a gentleman from Ohio, whether in this estimate he had included anything in reference to the $44,000,000 reserves, he said that he did not, that this calculation was made without reference to those reserves; which implies clearly that it is the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury to return to the reserves that proportion of the amount which has been already drawn from it to meet pressing liabilities within the last four months. That reply implies that it is the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury to return these reserves to the place from which he improperly, illegally, and unjustly took them, as soon as the revenues of the country will permit it. Now let me pause a moment to reflect upon the consequences of such a course if taken. As we all know, the reserves are $44,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury being required, in his judgment, by the impending difficulties of the Treasury, has drawn upon those reserves to the extent of $25,000,000 or $26,000,000. If the revenues of the country continue to decrease he intends to draw on the balance; to do what with them? To put them out in the country for circulation. This will be a practical addition to the currency to the amount of $44,000,000, an addition to that extent to the volume allowed by law. Now, we are told by the highest authority that that amount is not included in this estimate; hence that no account is taken of it, either as a resource or for purposes of disbursement. As soon as the current revenues of the Government will permit, the $44,000,000 will go back into the Treasury, where it will remain. That will create a panic in this country worse than the panic of last fall. Take $44,000,000 out of the floating circulating medium of this nation, from the hands of the people, and we all know what calamitous results will follow to the industrial and commercial interests. In the absence of any legislation on the part of Congress as to what shall be done with this $44,000,000 question, if this Congress shall adjourn without taking cognizance of that general question, my word for it that the panic we had last fall will be as nothing compared with the panic which will follow before Congress meets again, unless the President shall call us together in extra session to avert the ruin that will be impending over us.

According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury he had on hand at the beginning of the fiscal year $99,462,028.50, and the receipts for the first quarter were $24,104,310.58; but the estimates for the remaining five months were $187,100,000, making a total available income from all sources for the year of $570,666,330.58. This large aggregate income will have to be totally exhausted.

After presenting his figures in illustration, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means proceeds to tell us of the remedy. He says there are but three ways: first, by borrowing; secondly, by taxation; and, thirdly, by retrenchment. He discards the two former of these, and throws himself entirely upon economy and retrenchment as the only mode of extrication from the difficulty. But that gentleman appears not to see that all his propositions for economy and retrenchment apply as to what shall take place after the present fiscal year, and not during it. He very properly demands economical reform in the expenditures of the Government, and I will go with him in procuring anything desired in that way. But the deficiencies in the Treasury are now pressing and immediate. They lack resources to meet the expenditures already provided for by the appropriation bills of the last Congress. It is the present moment that is the life of the Government, and not what may take place next year or the year after.

While in my judgment the $319,000,000 demanded for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1875, is at least $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 too much and it should be reduced to about $250,000,000, yet that is not now the question which is to supply a deficit existing with reference to the demands of the Treasury before the commencement of the next fiscal year. Therefore I regret that the gentleman has not presented to us some practical proposition to meet the danger of bankruptcy now staring us in the face. I concur with him that the people will bear no further taxation. It is already too onerous for the industries of the country. Nor am I in favor of adding one dollar to the permanent debt. I therefore see no mode of relief except in the direction of a curtailment of expenditures. My proposition is that all of the balances unexpended of the appropriations of last year shall be withheld, only those that are absolutely necessary, until after the expiration of the fiscal year, or until the resources of the Treasury from legitimate sources will enable the Government to meet them.

In my judgment our receipts from imports will be larger than estimated, and that at least $15,000,000 of the $25,000,000 of dutiable goods now remaining in the bonded warehouses will be withdrawn before the 1st of June, and thus add that amount to the resources of the Government; and with the reviving spring trade there can be no reason why we may not anticipate a much larger income than the Secretary and chairman appear to anticipate. But whether these expectations may be realized or not, I think there can be no doubt as to the policy of holding a very large proportion of the money heretofore appropriated, especially for public works, entirely from payment until we are in a condition to do so without embarrassing the Treasury.

But, aside from these considerations, had the policy of the Government been judicious the Treasury would not have been in its present condition notwithstanding the falling off in revenue. If the whole of the receipts for the last seven years had been devoted to its legitimate purpose, we could have been in no such distraint as now. No people have borne so much taxation within the same period with so little resistance or objection. About $1,000,000,000 every three years has been absorbed by the Government from the industries to the country; whereas about $600,000,000 should have been sufficient to have defrayed the necessary expenses and meet the interest on the public debt.

What has been the policy? The readiness of the people to bear taxes has invited extravagance and profligacy here. As they responded to the calls of the Treasury, so have the Government and Congress been encouraged to pursue a system of lavish expenditure and the creation of a large retinue of unnecessary officials. The gentleman from Massachusetts told us in his speech that there were twenty-eight hundred persons employed in the Treasury Department alone, whereas but four hundred are authorized by law. Take this one example, and draw from it a proper conclusion. A like system of an unnecessary increase of patronage in the creation of unnecessary officials of every grade and character throughout the United States has been the chief occupation of Congress at every session, until to-day the aggregate civil list of the United States comprehends a larger number of persons for like purposes than is employed by Germany, France, and England, put together.

I present herewith a series of tables gathered from the Biennial Register or Blue Book for the years named, which conclusively prove this. Indeed, a general extravagance and waste pervade each of the Executive Departments. The chairman, Mr. DAWES, has referred to some of them, but only to a few. I have followed the line of investigation, which he but began, and present a series of tables, carefully gathered from official sources, which show and prove this:

As is well known to the well-informed members of this House the Blue Book, from which this list is made up, does not contain all the persons employed by the Government on the civil list; while every one indicated is employed, there are many thousands employed not stated. This fact is especially true of the Treasury, Navy, Interior, and Post-Office Departments. Therefore, I think I am quite safe in saying that, when I give this list as authority, there is a very large outside number of persons employed over and beyond those contained in it. I am therefore probably much under, and certainly not over, the true number of persons employed at this time on the civil list.

I will not detain the House with any comments upon this extraordinary statement. It will be observed that the increase in the number of employés has been continued since the close of the war, and is now rapidly increasing. It is unnecessary to argue that with so large a number of persons supported by the Government the expenses must necessarily be great, not only in regard to the salaries required, but also in large additional expenditures for other purposes growing out of the fact of their employment. The tables of expenditures which I shall now present prove this conclusively.

Comparative tables of expenditures of the public service collated from reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and other official documents.

POST-OFFICE.

1870	23,998,837 63
1872	26,658,192 31
1874, (estimated; see report of the Postmaster-General for 1873)	33,929,912 00

Thus the Post-Office cost $22,730,592.65 in 1868, and in the year 1874 $33,929,912.00

The above figures are gathered from the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury for the years indicated, and, therefore, cannot be questioned. Those for 1874 are the estimate stated in the report of the Postmaster-General, of the 1st of December, 1873. It will be observed that in 1868 less than twenty-three millions for this Department were sufficient, while for the present year thirty-four millions are required—an increase of over 50 per cent.

NAVAL.

In the sum appropriated this year are included four millions called extraordinary in consequence of the preparations made necessary by the Cuban difficulties. And yet, though probably made necessary at that time, this sum thus expended for the uses of the Navy in outfit and purchase of armaments of war certainly rendered it unnecessary to ask the large sum that was afterward appropriated. There can be no doubt that in this, as well as in the Post-Office Department, there are grave reasons for believing that much larger sums are expended than can be legitimately required.

The Postmaster-General was very active in procuring the abolition of the franking privilege, stating in an official document sent to this House that if Congress would enact a law to this effect it would insure a saving of several millions in the expenses of his Department. Congress did so, the law taking effect upon the 1st of July last; and yet he asks us for the next fiscal year to allow him about $5,000,000 in excess of what he expended in 1873, before the franking privilege was abolished. This fact, taken in connection with the enormous increase in the number of persons employed by this Department, naturally creates a pervading distrust in the integrity of its management. There is one feature in its administration that has not as yet been investigated, and that is its unrestricted authority in making contracts for supplies. A large portion of the moneys disbursed are expended in that direction—sometimes, it is said, in the interest of persons closely connected with the officials who have the authority to control these disbursements. But as I make no statements of fact not susceptible of proof by documentary or other testimony, I shall make no further reference to these allegations.

Comparative receipts and expenditures of the Internal Revenue Department, collated from the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Fiscal year ending—	Receipts.	Cost of collection.	Per cent.

1870	184,899,756 49	7,234,531 14	4
1871	143,098,153 63	7,075,187 14	5
1872	130,642,177 72	5,697,288 34	4
1873	113,729,314 14	5,337,124 23	4¾
1874 (estimated by Secretary)	103,000,000 00	*5,398,380 00	5¼

* Reported by Committee on Appropriations.

While I have no disposition to question the integrity of the head of this Bureau, yet I am compelled to made a reference to a few facts in connection with the above table, and the management of the collection of the internal revenue.

It will be observed that the cost of collection has not decreased pari passu with the amount collected. In 1867 $266,000,000 were collected at an expense of less than $8,000,000, or 3 per cent. upon the amount collected; while, in 1869, $158,000,000 cost $7,200,000 to collect, being 4½ per cent. upon the amount collected. In 1871 $143,000,000 were collected, at an expense of over $7,000,000, being 5 per cent. upon the cost of collection. In July, 1872, Congress passed a law doing away with the offices of assessors and assistant assessors, which it was stated at the time would insure a saving to the Treasury of $1,800,000 a year. An amendment had been made to the internal-revenue laws which abolished taxes on most of the articles heretofore taxed, reducing the collection upon only whisky, tobacco, &c.; and yet we find that $5,697,000 was appropriated for this Bureau in 1872, and $5,337,000 in 1873. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the receipts to be expected from internal revenue in 1874 may be stated at $103,000,000; and yet the Committee on Appropriations reports $5,398,380 required for this period, which will be 5¼ per cent. upon the cost of collection.

But the amounts appropriated for the expenses of the Internal-Revenue Bureau do not comprehend all that this service costs the Government. There is still a larger amount of which we know nothing. Of the defalcations and losses incurred by the dishonesty or negligence of the subordinate officials employed, we know nothing. I have this day received a communication from the Commissioner, in answer to a request made by me of the amount of defalcations and arrearages in his Bureau, which throws some light upon this question. Wishing to do no injustice, I give it in full:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, March 5, 1874.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to state that the records of this office show that the aggregate amount of internal-revenue collected during the period from September, 1862, (when the internal-revenue laws first went into effect,) up to February 28, 1874, (last month estimates,) is $1,792,555,000. Of this amount there is now due the United States from late collectors, the sum of $2,525,199,13; which is about 14-100 of 1 per cent. of the total amount collected.

Of the total amount due, $2,136,489.24 is due from officers appointed prior to March 4, 1869, and $388,709.89 due from officers appointed since March 4, 1869.

In many cases there is reason to believe that the deficiency may have arisen from defalcations of deputies and employés of the collector, for whose official conduct he is legally responsible. In such cases the collector cannot be considered as personally guilty of embezzlement, though possibly censurable for not having exercised proper care. Under the present laws his remedy against his deputies is through the State courts, where settlements are often long delayed.

Steps have been taken to recover the amounts due from these officers, by suit upon their official bonds. The United States attorneys in charge of these suits are urged by this office to a vigorous prosecution of the same, and with a few exceptions it is probable that the greater portion of the amount due will eventually be recovered and paid into the Treasury.

There are a number of cases of late collectors whose accounts are yet unsettled, and are now being adjusted, in which this office has no information of any defalcation or criminal retention of public funds, by either the collector or any of his employés, and consequently the outstanding balances shown upon the books of this office in these cases have not been included in the above statement.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. FERNANDO WOOD,
House of Representatives.

EXPENDITURES ON ACCOUNT OF INDIANS.

In these expenditures a like increase appears, with probably a less justification than in any other Department of the Government. Nor do these figures comprise the entire expenses of that service. They do not comprehend the cost of the Army. These appear in the Army appropriation bill, merged in the general expenditures for Army purposes. Thus a most efficient agency for the proper subjection or protection, as the case may be, of the Indians is left entirely out of this account. It does, however, include the support of the Indian agencies, the ostensible supply of Indian goods, in many cases bought and paid for but never delivered; the furnishing of rifles and rum; the pretended payment to Indians of money required under the so-called treaties with their tribes, half of which is stolen before it reaches them; and the hangers-on of those who are employed to execute these treaties.

As I shall refer more especially to the policy of the Government in dealing with this grave question in the concluding portion of my remarks, I will omit further comment at this time.

COAST SURVEY.

The increased expenditure for this department is to me unaccountable. Although living upon the sea-coast for many years, a shipowner, and familiar with everything appertaining to this branch of the public service, yet I cannot see any reason why there should not be a large decrease in its cost. Without being informed as to the different items which compose these great annual aggregates, it seems to me utterly impossible that for the purposes of coast survey they can reach any such sum.

There is not one foot of the Atlantic coast from Halifax to the cape of Florida that was not completely surveyed fifty years ago. It is now nearly forty years since Professor Hassler, then the most eminent man living in his profession, first took charge of this duty, and successfully explored and designated everything necessary. The system he established has not been, and cannot be, improved. Under it our navigators have been made acquainted with every objective point, every harbor, every inlet, together with the soundings of the whole coast. It is true that in our recent Pacific acquisitions something new was to be explored; but certainly the twenty-five years intervening since the annexation of California have been sufficient to have accomplished this. Therefore, I cannot fail to conclude that, in this as well as in the others, corruption or wasteful extravagance exists.

SURVEYING PUBLIC LANDS.

1873	1,128,960 13

1868	$95,209 75
1869	96,596 08

It will be seen by the above table that, while in 1868 the cost of surveying the public lands was but $373,252, in 1873 it was $1,128,060, an increase that cannot be accounted for or explained. The proceeds of the sales of the public lands in 1868 were $1,348,715, while in 1873 they were only $2,882,312, an increase of about 100 per cent., and the increase of the expenses of the cost of surveying between 1868 and 1873 was more than 200 per cent. And when we take into consideration the fact that the money purchasing power is twice as great now as it was in 1868, this increase seems enormous.

The above statement does not include the expenses of the General Land Office in Washington, and many other items which appear under other heads. The surveyor-generals' office expenses show a like result, and therefore comment upon them is unnecessary.

JUDICIARY.

Public attention has recently been called to the Department of Justice, and many severe criticisms made upon its management. I have no desire to enter into this discussion. The table presented above tells its own story, upon which I propose to make but a few comments.

Two or three years ago the increased demands upon the Treasury from this quarter were excused upon the pretended Ku-Klux prosecutions in the Southern States. Large sums, it was said, were placed in the hands of United States marshals for the purpose of protecting freedmen and others from outrages in that quarter. Thus apparently justified, the appropriations went on increasing until we see that while in 1868 $723,000 was sufficient, in 1873 $3,826,000 are required; being more than five times as much as was wanted five years ago. Since the last presidential election we have heard nothing of the Ku-Klux. Therefore, that phantom bugbear should not serve as a pretext now. It has served out its double purpose of plunder and partisan excitement, and cannot be offered as an excuse for this enormously increased disbursement. It is true that Congress has made a few new judicial districts, but the sums required for them are comparatively trifling, when we consider the greatness of the amount expended.

UNITED STATES MINTS AND ASSAY OFFICES.

Estimated by Secretary of the Treasury, 1874	1,333,195 00
Allowed by Committee on Appropriations, 1874	1,026,240 00

The difference between the two years given for this service is sought to be excused on the ground that at the last Congress a law was passed making it necessary to reorganize the system. I am familiar with that subject, having addressed the House at the time in favor of the bill. It was defended by the committee that reported it, that its object was merely to simplify and make more effective existing organizations without involving any additional expense. Such was my opinion at the time, because I could not see how any could be required. And yet we see it is to cost about a half million dollars.

SUB-TREASURIES.

Here may be observed the same extraordinary increase, though in this case it has been more gradual and regular than in either of the preceding statements, each year showing the upward scale. What sufficed for 1868 is doubled for 1874. This is very remarkable, in view of the fact that not one additional sub-treasury has been established nor assistant treasurer been required in addition to those which existed at that time. There really exists no reason whatever for any increased expenditure in this branch of the public service. No additional duties have been imposed and no necessity for a greater number of employés exists that did not exist in 1871 and 1872. On the contrary, there is less business performed at this time by these offices than there has been in any year since the war.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Under the head of "miscellaneous" are comprehended a large number of items of various characters, but which for the purposes of Treasury designation are placed under this head. It does not include payment of interest upon the public debt, the civil list, or foreign intercourse, nor the naval and military establishments, nor pensions and Indians, but everything outside of these. The above table is significant in showing that the increase is general and applicable to the whole public service, not only in its regular departments but as well in the appropriations made by Congress for purposes outside of these. Comment is unnecessary. These figures tell their own story, upon which it is not necessary to dilate.

The laws passed during the war, and probably made necessary at that time, imposed extraordinary burdens upon the people. But what was excusable then can have no excuse now. Our first duty was to have modified or repealed most of them. What has been done? With the exception of a reduction of 10 per cent. in the tariff and a trifle in the Army and Navy, nothing has been done. The civil list has been increased, as well as the expense of every other branch of the public service. We have continued the taxation created during the war with but slight modification. The precious metals have been largely exported instead of being kept at home. Within the last nine years our mines have produced about $640,000,000. Out of this we have coined but $244,351,395 in gold and $25,787,331 in silver, a total of $270,138,726. Thus it will be seen that but little more than 42 per cent. of the whole has been coined, and the balance has been made into bars and sent to Europe. In addition we have received in coin during that period into the Treasury for duties on imports, &c., $1,590,124,286. Now, notwithstanding the receipt of so much precious metal into the Treasury, we have still maintained and increased the paper-money circulation.

The policy of the Administration in paying off the large proportion of our public debt with these receipts had for its object self-glorification. It has been wedded to a fatal error, either ignorant of its consequences or willing to perpetrate so great a wrong simply for the purpose of procuring partisan objects. The panic of last fall and the strain that has been made upon the public Treasury within six months, producing national dishonor, have both been the result of this policy. The Government would not now be in a dishonored position had not the fatal policy of anticipating the public debt been adopted.

Three months after the commencement of the present Administration, on the 4th of March, 1869, the then Secretary of the Treasury found himself in possession of a surplus balance, over and above the preceding year's receipts and expenditures, of $49,000,000, of which $45,000,000 had been accumulated within three months. These large sums of cash on hand should have been held sacred as a foundation for the redemption of the legal-tenders upon which to begin resumption. Instead of doing this, he inaugurated a system of redemption of the bonded debt not due, while entirely neglecting the legal-tender debt past due, and insisted upon continuing the ruinous war taxation for the purpose of extending this policy. He bought $41,000,000 of bonds the first year, upon which he paid a premium of $8,322,791, thus paying a bonus out of the public funds for the privilege of doing not only a continued injury to the industry of the country by the enormous taxation, but also in diverting its resources from the liquidation of demand notes such as the legal-tenders, and by the payment of the funded obligations having eighteen years to mature. According to the Treasury statement issued the 1st of March, 1874, there were purchased $323,253,800 of bonds between April, 1869, and September 25, 1873, upon which was paid a premium of $39,758,532.71. If this had not been done there would now be nearly $50,000,000 in the Treasury with which to meet the present deficiency and save the country from the impending necessity of increasing the public debt, or imposing more taxation. It is difficult to find words to sufficiently express a proper condemnation of such a suicidal policy. What would be thought of a merchant who anticipated the payment of his obligations having a long time to run, while he, at the same time, neglected to liquidate those which were payable on demand and remained dishonored?

I am opposed both to the extension of the public debt as well as the anticipation of it in payment. This people have endured sacrifices enough already to maintain the solidarity of the Union; and it is just to leave to posterity, who will derive the chief advantage from it, some part of the burden, and not endure it all ourselves. Therefore, I would not pay another dollar of the public debt until we have returned to specie payments, and materially lessened the existing taxation. If, when that is done, the remainder can be advantageously appropriated to lessening the bonded debt, I am quite willing to do so.

As illustrative of the evils which flow from the ruinous policy which has been adopted with reference to the payment of any portion of the public debt, look at the condition of the public Treasury at this time. The falling off in the revenues, growing out of a variety of circumstances, has left the Treasury not only depleted of money sufficient to meet its current obligations, but has also compelled the Secretary of the Treasury to lay his hands, without authority of law in my judgment, upon a reserved fund which he, as well as his predecessors, had considered as having been permanently withdrawn from circulation. He was compelled to do this, or place the Government before the world in a condition of bankruptcy, a state of things the natural result of a diversion of the surplus revenues of the country to a purpose not necessary at the time, nor consistent with any safe principle of finance.

MOIETIES.

Public attention has recently been called to the subject of moieties, which are the perquisites of Government officials employed to protect the Treasury, outside of their regular salaries, as a compensation or incentive to them to perform the duty which they take an oath to perform to the best of their ability when receiving their appointments. There is no other country that pays its leading custom-house officials anything like as much as we do; nor is there any other commercial or maritime nation that affords to those officials the same facilities for accumulating enormous wealth as the United States. In Europe the moiety system has been abolished altogether. The regular compensation of the collector, naval officer, and surveyor of the port of New York, not including seizures or other perquisites, may be fairly stated at $20,000 a year each. The duties devolved upon these officials are mostly performed by subordinates. A leave of absence for six months could be given to either of them without any detriment to the public service. Indeed it is quite practicable and consistent with the public good to comprehend the duties of the three in one. Until recently we paid the President of the United States but $25,000 a year, and I can see no reason why a custom-house official, with little responsibility and no labor, should be paid nearly as much. It is true there are other than official duties expected of the incumbents of these offices. They have onerous political, if not official, duties to perform. They are made responsible by the Administration and its friends in Washington for the political condition of the State. They are expected to preserve the State to the dominant party by the dispensation of their patronage into the interior and a liberal distribution of money. They are made responsible for political results. Hence, in addition to their fixed pay, these enormous opportunities for gain have been granted to them by the party in power, through its action in Congress. They are each allowed one-sixth of all seizures, fines, and penalties derived from goods attempted to be imported in disregard of the duties imposed by law. While it is true that this feature of the revenue law is not of recent introduction, yet it is equally true that it has never before been carried to the extent to which it has been under this Administration. Before the advent of General Grant to power, in no one year during the history of the Government would the aggregate income of the collector of the port of New York exceed thirty to thirty-five thousand dollars a year, including salary, and yet the importations there defrayed more than two-thirds of the whole expenses of the Government without any internal revenue whatever. But now, impelled by avarice or partisan interests, scarcely an importer of the city of New York but is subject to espionage, surveillance, and oppression. Under the slightest pretext whole cargoes are sought to be confiscated, and the greed of the informers and spies of the Government, who act as the agents of the officials, appears to have no bounds. It is true the complicated machinery created for the collection of the revenue, and the crude tariff laws, and the many amendments continually made to them by Congress, appear to invite this course. The errors of hasty legislation, and the manner in which we create legal enactments in Congress, afford ample scope for the ingenuity of those buzzards of prey who destroy property and reputation without compunction of conscience. The events of these last two years, in New York and Boston, prove one of two things: either that our revenue laws and the mode of collecting the revenue are radically defective, and should be amended or repealed, or that the Government has placed men to administer those laws who are a disgrace to the country. The evil is terrible, and should be at once eradicated.

It is well to understand that this question in no way involves the tariff, though it may emanate from it. It is immaterial for the purposes of its consideration whether the duties on imports are high or low. The evils of which we complain are in the collection laws and in their execution by officials and agents subordinate to the Treasury Department. Nor is it necessary to make imputations against any political party. In my experience I have found that bad laws and bad men are evils for which no party should be held responsible. In saying this, however, let me not be understood as intending to relieve the present Administration of its responsibility for the shameful increase in the oppressive exactions made upon the merchants of New York since it has held the reins of power.

The system of allowing moieties to informers and spies is not a new thing in this country. It has existed as long as the Government itself. It was incorporated into the second tariff act enacted March 2, 1799, after the organization of the Government. At that time there was good reason for its adoption. We had no revenue-cutter system, the custom-houses were poorly organized, and without an established system for the collection of the duty upon imports. The evasion of the revenue laws was confined exclusively to smuggling. This was the only process at that time adopted by those who sought to defraud the Government by the introduction of foreign goods without the payment of duty. The undervaluation of invoices and the more modern tricks at deception had not been thought of. Hence there was good reason for the allowance of a liberal perquisite to those who underwent the hazard and experienced the danger and difficulties of seizing smuggled goods. The coast was wild, custom-house officials but few in number, and the Government very properly took this means of inducing others to exercise a vigilance by offering them a moiety of the seizures. This law, drawn by Alexander Hamilton, originated in this country the system of moieties, which has existed ever since. The next law, of 1867, changed the moiety allowed and provided for the seizure of books and papers.

The history of this law of 1867 is that one week before the adjournment of Congress, on the 4th of March, 1867, such a bill had not been introduced into either House. It made its first appearance in the Senate on the 25th of February, 1867, and reached the House, or it passed the Senate, at midnight of Sunday, March 3. It passed the House at its expiring moments, with two minutes' debate. By this law the provisions of several preceding acts intended for the protection of an honest importer were repealed, and most extraordinary powers conferred upon the collector and his subordinates in the prosecution of importers in the collection of fines and penalties. The collector is made the judge as to the intent of the importer in all cases of seizure, although he is at the same time an interested party in the confiscation of the goods alleged to be undervalued.

In order to fully understand how innocently any man is liable to be entrapped and ruined in reputation and fortune by the custom-house process in New York, it is necessary to illustrate by a reference to facts.

A merchant is charged with a violation of the law, as, for instance, that he has presented to the custom-house an invoice stating the cost of his goods at a less price than that stated by some other merchant, or his correspondent abroad may have omitted some of the usual or unusual charges, or there may be a mistake in the addition or subtraction of his invoice, or some irregularity or error of a clerk in copying; or it may have been that the purchase of his merchandise may have been made under circumstances that enabled him to procure them at a slight reduction from what others had to pay, or that he had by superior ability and moneyed facilities obtained some other advantage which enabled him to lay his goods down at the port of New York at a slight reduction under others. In either of these cases, however innocent of any intention to defraud, and however truthfully his invoice may state the actual cost, he is liable, his goods are forfeited, with other penalties, including a whole invoice covering a vast amount of other articles to which a similar complaint cannot be made. The whole is forfeited to the Government, and he is mulcted in heavy liabilities and costs, and the judges to determine these questions are the parties who have a large pecuniary interest in doing so.

Take another case. The informers who get such a large proportion of the penalties and forfeitures, bribe a merchant's clerk, offering him large inducements to betray the secrets of his books and papers, and, indeed, as has been alleged, to make, himself, errors in the accounts, upon which evidence of frauds are proven and the merchant made to disgorge under fear of moral or, it may be, pecuniary, ruin. If, however, the merchant, conscious of innocence, determines to resist this outrage, and his conscience acquits him of any intent to commit fraud, he seeks legal advice; he is willing to test the case in court, and so informs his counsel. He is warned, however, that the court itself is made the judge of the intent. It is said that recently the judge of the southern district declared, in relation to cases pending in that court for seizure, that "the Government cases appeared to have collapsed. Of all that were on the calendar only five or six have been tried. It seems that when a little squeezing is brought upon the defendants in these cases they disappear." What this "squeezing" is may well be imagined. An intelligent writer in one of the leading papers of New York thus refers to it. He says that—

> The squeezing may be the handcuff process of Detective Jayne, or the high moral pressure of District-Attorney Bliss, whose finer intellectual principles would scarce stoop to the coarse process of the professional informer. Whatever it is, it has always proved effectual, as hundreds of plundered merchants could testify.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives, has communicated the amount of money paid from July 1, 1862, to November 30, 1873, in the settlement suits, judgments, or claims made by or in behalf of the United States for the violation of the revenue laws at the New York and Boston custom-houses, in Executive Document No. 124.

For New York he states it to be, from March 1, 1869, to November 30, 1873, $2,007,854.46, and from July 1, 1862, to March 1, 1869, $1,745,658.29, making a total of $3,753,512.75. Of this sum there was distributed to the informers $1,838,766.26. The amount distributed from March 1, 1869, to November 30, 1873, being a period of four years and nine months, was $987,132.49, while from July 1, 1862, to March 1, 1869, a period of six years and eight months, it was $851,633.77, being proof of the superior activity of the present officials over their predecessors. Of these amounts the collector of the port received $407,245.97; the naval officer $324,058.64; and the surveyor $391,213.61, leaving $916,248.04 to the informers, most of which was received by B. G. Jayne, the special agent of the Treasury Department. These sums do not include the interest which these officials have in the cases pending in the United States court. I have been furnished with an official statement of the customs-seizure cases on the calendar of that court, February 24, 1874. They are twenty-nine in number, for about $100,000 in amount, which, together with a suit to recover $100,000, since begun, make an aggregate of about $200,000, of which these officers and the informers would be entitled to one-half in case the prosecutions are successful. I have reason to believe that since the agitation of the subject other suits, covering much larger sums, are in contemplation by the Government officials at New York.

For Boston the Secretary gives a statement only from March 1, 1869, to December 31, 1873. What was his motive for having included for New York the amount for a period anterior to the 4th of March, 1869, is not given. This was all he was asked for by the resolution of the House of Representatives. And why he should have gone back as far as 1863 for New York, and not for Boston, is also unknown. But his statement for Boston, in principle, is very much like that for New York. His report of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, from March 1, 1869, to December 31, 1873, for the port of Boston, shows that the whole amount received was $609,401.23, of which $305,249.92 was distributed outside of the Treasury. Of this the collector received $50,816.40; the naval officer, $50,187.74; the surveyor, $50,817.60; thus leaving $153,428.18 to the informers, most of which found its way into the hands of the inevitable B. G. Jayne.

Comment upon these facts, thus officially communicated, is unnecessary. The enormous sums received by those who have been clothed with official authority by the Treasury Department, as spies and informers is proof of a defect in the law as well as in its administration. It certainly cannot be necessary in this free Government that a system so antagonistic to our institutions should exist. Where the inducements are so great for men to prey upon each other it is expecting too much of them to be withheld by any merely moral considerations. Clothed with the power of the Government, and incited by avarice, that class of men who may be called professional spies and informers, are not restrained by any considerations whatever. Thus the worst passions of bad men—for it is only such who would accept these positions—are made active in the pursuit of gain. No thought of the reputation of others, no restraint of conscience, and no fear of consequences betray themselves.

The enlightened governments of Europe have long since abandoned this mode of securing revenue. Even Paris has discarded a practice which has become repulsive to Frenchmen. In these days of progress, intelligence, and high moral principles, this country, of all others, should make haste to rid itself of evils of this character. Public opinion will not long endure it. If we cannot collect our revenues and maintain the expenses of the Government without resorting to practices which are darker than anything which occurred during the days of the Spanish inquisition, there must be something radically wrong. We had better institute despotism at once and give it unlimited authority over the lives and property of the people.

SANBORN CONTRACTS.

When the general appropriation bill was before Congress in the spring of 1872, the two Houses disagreeing upon some of its provisions, conferees were appointed, and an effort was made to insert as an amendment the provision authorizing the appointment of these persons, but it failed. Subsequently other conferees were appointed under the same bill, when a Senator from South Carolina, now an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, succeeded in getting it adopted. This bill became a law on the 8th of May, 1872. In June of the same year a subsequent bill authorized a special appropriation of $100,000, to be used at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws, and $80,000 in addition was given for the same purpose in the regular appropriation bill. Thus $180,000 was placed at the disposal of the Secretary, besides the power of making special arrangements with the three persons now employed under the Sanborn contracts. These large sums of money thus appropriated and the power conferred upon these three irresponsible persons, it will be seen, were all placed outside of the Bureau for the collection of internal revenue. In that office properly belonged everything appertaining to this branch of the public service; yet, for some mysterious object the head of that Department was not only deprived of all power, but of all knowledge of what was going on through this secret agency. Under these contracts the grossest outrages have been committed upon private rights. The same species of intimidation and oppression adopted by all custom-house officials and their spies and informers, have been adopted, and large sums have been collected, one-half of which has gone into the pockets of these persons.

It will thus be seen that the authority really conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury has been abused. The law authorized him to employ three persons to assist the officers of the Government in collecting revenue which had heretofore been evaded. His sole power was confined to the appointment of persons to act in co-operation and in consultation with the existing officials; instead of which he conferred independent powers upon them, making with them a contract allowing them 50 per cent. of the amount recovered, and giving them secret instructions outside of and unknown to even the Commissioner of Internal Revenue himself, who is by law clothed with absolute authority over everything appertaining to internal revenue. Thus armed, Sanborn, Kelsey, and others went forth to prey upon the community. They levied their contributions right and left, bullying, coaxing, threatening, and intimidating banks, railroad corporations, bankers, merchants, traders, and others. The innocent and guilty alike were brought before this inquisitorial power, and made to compromise under fear of prosecution, and yield up at least something to swell the pockets of these Treasury cormorants. What amounts have been received by these persons cannot be known; the Government does not know, and of course Congress cannot know. Considering the character of the men, employed directly and indirectly, the probabilities are that not one dollar in five of the amount recovered has ever found its way to the Treasury. But enough has already been reported to show that these three persons have pocketed within three years at least $500,000 apiece. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says that in his judgment not one dollar has been covered into the Treasury from these sources that could not have been as well collected by the regular officers of his Bureau, without any additional cost whatever for so doing; that he is already clothed with ample power to have recovered every dollar really belonging to the Government, and therefore that the creation of this authority, outside and independent of him, has, while it has brought nothing in that would not have otherwise come, considerably hindered and embarrassed his own agents in the discharge of their official duties. Certainly there must have been some mysterious power which could have originally officially created these persons and clothed them with such authority, and which has so successfully been maintaining them ever since. There is a secret influence somewhere, and it is not for me to say who and what it is. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We have to deal with facts as they exist, and so perform our duties as to remedy abuses of such a character. Upon my motion, the Committee on Ways and Means have unanimously agreed to report a bill to repeal that section of the law to which I have referred, which authorized the Secretary to make these appointments. When that bill is before the House for discussion I shall have something more to say upon this subject, which I shall say without fear, though it may be distasteful to some members of this House.

In the Department of the Interior a struggle for the sole control of the Indian question is manifested. The President, a military commander, has allowed himself to be bamboozled by the head of that Department and some other sickly philanthropists, who desire to serve the Lord and the devil at the same time, by affecting the "moral-suasion" dodge in treating with the Indians. Finding the freedman, as a source of profit and philanthropy, no longer available, these people have essayed to use the poor Indian for like purposes. So the peace commission was instituted, and General O. O. Howard, that eminent soldier, Christian, and statesman, was selected to do up the moral-suasion business. The financial details of this effort at Christianizing the barbarians have not as yet been furnished. This must be left to a democratic Congress, because it is not at all likely that, after the exhibit of the Freedmen's Bureau, under the same administration, we shall be allowed to look into the precise cost in dollars and cents of the conversion of Indians to the true faith, and to know the result both in dollars and salvation. We do know, however, that Captain Jack and his confrères were especial favorites of this policy, and that they are vouched for as having been reconciled by that process and as examples of the efficacy of that mode of treatment.

It may be observed, however, that notwithstanding the cost of the peace policy and its alleged success, not a regiment was withdrawn nor a post abandoned that was occupied by our troops in the Indian country before it took place. The cost of the Army for that purpose is on the increase, as well as the Indian depredations themselves. I doubt whether the humanitarian system of dealing with warlike tribes, who are filled with the whisky which the money of the Government gives them and armed with the rifles likewise kindly furnished them, can produce the fruits of peace and loveliness. It is true money may have been made by this mode of treatment, although they appear to be more blood-thirsty and belligerent than ever. The nearer the Indian approximates to the walks of civilized life, the more clearly are developed his base instincts and love of all that is odious in our own characters. It is only in his wild, barbaric state that he is noble. Take him from his native fastnesses, and he becomes the most miserable specimen of a loafer, with all the vices and without any of the virtues of the white man. But whether my views upon this question are correct or not, it is quite certain that the policy of the Government with reference to the Indians has been alike expensive, inefficient, and productive of the worst consequences.

CONCLUSION.

I have thus briefly presented some of the errors for which the republican party is responsible. Were I to give them all, a day's time would be consumed in the enumeration. To that party, and the Congress and Administration it has created, may be charged all the public evils of the times, as well as the general private destitution and paralysis of trade. It has diffused throughout the nation erroneous and pernicious ideas of the nature of our Government, and taught the rising generation that extravagance, and not economy, is the road to wealth and happiness. It has depreciated public morals, and taught that by a pretext of philanthropy, Christianity, and temperance, the greatest public crimes could be committed and receive condonement in consequence. By its policy our great national resources have not been developed on a sound principle of production. Extravagance, profligacy, demoralization, and general instability pervade the whole body-politic. Everything is artificial and uncertain. Nothing is stable in property. We have neither permanency nor safety. The earnings of a life of probity and purity offer no security as against the avarice of the officials it has placed in office. To satisfy its thirst for gain, and to continue its partisan dominancy, all men and all things must fall, if necessary; the great leading object being power and plunder. These two words comprise the motto on its banner, under which it fights and by which it expects to maintain itself hereafter.

In conclusion, I present a series of allegations implicating this party. I defy contradiction as to the accuracy and truth of every one of them:

First. Through the Government of its creation it has maintained a large standing Army at great expense during a time of peace.

Secondly. It has issued and continued a depreciated irredeemable paper currency, called legal-tender, without taking one step toward redemption.

Thirdly. It has usurped, by force, the State authority in several States, producing anarchy and despotism and repudiation of their public moneyed obligations.

Fourthly. It has increased the civil list from 44,500 persons in 1860 to 86,660 persons in 1873.

Fifthly. It has instituted a system of espionage and oppression in the execution of the revenue laws, which has resulted in enriching custom-house and other officials, without aiding the public Treasury.

Sixthly. It has created and maintained direct taxation, which, until its advent to power, had been unknown in this country since the close of the American Revolution.

Seventhly. It has stealthily absorbed the whole governmental power of the country at the Federal capital, until all State interests are made subservient and dependent upon its will.

Eighthly. It has driven from circulation gold and silver, the only constitutional medium, and, notwithstanding its large receipts in coin from customs duties and mines, does nothing toward its restoration.

Ninthly. In disregard of the policy adopted by other leading nations, it has permitted the export to foreign countries of about $1,000,000,000 of the precious metals, instead of retaining them here for its necessities and the restoration of a sound currency.

Tenthly. It has increased the salaries of all officials, including that of the President, which it still maintains, though industries are oppressed and poverty goes starving through our streets.

Eleventhly. It has maintained a protective tariff in the interest of a class, to the detriment of the whole people.

Twelfthly. It has, since 1869, anticipated the public debt, not due for twenty years, and paid $40,000,000 for the privilege of doing so, although the immediate obligations of the Government were dishonored and the Treasury is now exhausted.

Thirteenthly. It has inaugurated a fatal policy in its treatment of the Indians—part peace and part war—by dealing out moral suasion to the most warlike, and certain death to the most peaceful, thus adding to the difficulties and expenses of a proper settlement of this serious question.

Fourteenthly. To divert public attention from the extent of the profligacy and extravagance of its horde of officials, it pretends the establishment of a rule of civil-service reform which it applies altogether to a few clerks in Washington, where there are no votes to be had, but ignores elsewhere where party services as a reward for office are required.

Fifteenthly. It has diffused erroneous ideas of the nature of our Government to the youthful and uninformed, and taught by example a general looseness of public and private morality, which tends to subvert the permanency of our institutions and loosen the foundation stones of social order and public well-being.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, in taking the floor to discuss the question pending before the House, I appreciate the wide scope and magnitude of the subject which is involved. It is not merely whether we can and ought to dispense with the particular taxes sought to be repealed by the two little bills before the House—the tax on matches and the tax on bank-checks—but the subjects referred to the Committee on Ways and Means at the commencement of the session—taxation and revenues, the condition of the Treasury, and even the necessary expenditures of the Government, not only during the present fiscal year, but for the next and for a series of years in the future—present themselves for consideration and discussion.

I do not desire to discuss these questions in a partisan spirit or for party purposes, nor to go back to the legislation of preceding Congresses, whether republican or democratic, to inquire as to the action of a party or the particular course of individuals in reference to the revenues and expenditures of the Government. I design rather to present some figures which have aided my own investigations and seem to have an important bearing upon this great question, and to them I invite the attention of the House. They will be found in the tables that I shall submit.

When the last Congress adjourned there were apparently abundant revenues. Upon assembling at this session we were startled to find that the national debt, no longer diminishing, had actually increased. The revenues, falling off, had become insufficient to meet current expenditures, and Treasury notes were being issued to supply the deficit.

Two years ago our predecessors were deliberating what reductions could be made most advantageously in national taxation, which furnished too abundant resources. They found a plethoric Treasury. Its vaults to-day are almost empty. They sought to cut down the surplus of $57,000,000 annually remaining after paying the sinking fund. We are groping to find resources, or to stop expenditures, so as to avoid a deficit, which the Secretary lately informed us would reach nearly the same amount.

The cause of this great difference—of the contrast between its present condition and the large balance the Treasury was then able annually to apply upon the public debt—has not wholly arisen from the influence of the late panic upon business, nor in enlarged expenditures, but in part because the reduction of taxation was greater than prudence should have dictated, and more than the subsequent Treasury receipts have justified.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the cautious and accurate statisticians and subordinates in his Department, as well as legislators, seem to have been over-sanguine as to the swelling volume of importations and customs revenues.

During the fiscal year 1873, the same in which taxation had been reduced over $50,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury paid off over $50,000,000 of the public debt, although the cash in the Treasury was reduced over $7,000,000 to make the payment.

TREASURY ESTIMATES.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report for December, 1872, estimated the Treasury receipts for that and the ensuing fiscal years, ending respectively June, 1873 and 1874, as follows:

Source.	1873.	1874.
Customs	$192,000,000	$200,000,000
Internal revenue	108,000,000	103,000,000
Miscellaneous	19,000,000	17,000,000
Total	319,000,000	300,000,000

The report for December, 1873, showed for same years actual and estimated receipts:

Source.	1873.	1874.
Customs	$188,000,000	$160,000,000
Internal revenue	113,000,000	92,000,000
Miscellaneous	32,000,000	19,000,000
Total	333,000,000	271,000,000

REVENUES.

The monthly receipts from customs duties, internal revenue, and total from all sources, since the 1st of January, 1871, when the reductions in the tariff act of 1870 took effect, have been furnished me by the Treasury Department. Their data will be of great value in estimating the revenues for the remainder of the year.

Statement of the receipts of the Government from January, 1871, to February, 1874, inclusive, as per returns in the office at the close of business on the last day of each month.

Adding the receipts for the first eight months of the fiscal years 1872, 1873, and 1874, and the totals for the two former and proportionate estimate for the latter, we have the following comparison:

Source.	1872.	1873.	1874.
Eight months:
Customs	$146,721,000 55	$129,412,972 76	$108,436,805 53
Internal revenue	84,542,259 73	76,214,962 11	65,451,929 25
Total receipts	240,309,898 59	227,065,834 36	194,606,612 94
For the year:
Customs	216,370,286 77	188,089,522 00	162,655,210 00

The probable receipts for the present fiscal year, unless the falling off is greater proportionately for the last third of the year than for the two thirds already elapsed, will be $292,000, 00. The receipts for the same period last year were $108,000,000, while for the remainder of this year $93,000,000 only will be required, or $24,500,000 per month, to reach the sum of $292,000,000.

Other members of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the examination of the subject, and in discussing the question before the House, have presented tables and figures which I do not care to stop to recapitulate, or to refer to at this time, except to say that the estimates and figures that they present do not show as much as the estimate I have made. My colleague on the committee from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] has stated the revenue to come into the Treasury from all sources will probably reach $288,000,000, and that the Secretary himself admits the present showing to be $10,000,000 better than he reported to us as the probable receipts at the beginning of the present session of Congress.

EXPENDITURES FOR THE FISCAL YEAR.

The Treasury estimate of expenditures for 1874, given to Congress by the Secretary at the commencement of this Congress, exclusive of principal and premium on public debt, was:

First quarter, actual	$88,718,578 21
Three quarters, estimated	200,630,000 00
Total for year, estimated	289,348,578 21

The estimate made by the Treasury Department in January, 1874, places the amount required—

For the fiscal year	$292,286,247 07
For the sinking fund	29,191,369 28
Total expenditure	321,477,616 35

Even with the more favorable estimate of receipts the annual income is insufficient for 1874. The account will stand:

Expenditures	$321,477,616 35
Receipts	291,910,000 00
Deficit	29,567,616 35

CASH STATEMENT FOR 1874.

July 1, 1873, cash in Treasury		$131,192,028 50
Less specie deposits	$31,730,000 00
Less coin deposits	39,460,000 00
		71,190,000 00
Balance cash belonging to the Government		60,002,028 50
Receipts, estimated, for 1874		291,910,000 00
Total amount		251,912,028 50
Deduct expenditures		321,477,616 35
Balance cash on hand July 1, 1874		30,434,412 15

The deficit for the current year may be bridged over until another year by drawing down the cash in the Treasury if next year's receipts shall increase or its expenditures lessen.

First. What will be the receipts for 1875? How will they compare with those of 1874?

TREASURY ESTIMATE FOR 1875.

Internal revenue	108,000,000
Total	305,700,000

If the importations of dutiable goods continue as large as they have been since 1870 the estimates are reliable. They paid during the fiscal year 1872 $216,000,000 customs duties into the Treasury, and by modification of rates and repeal of duties, taking effect in the next fiscal year, the estimated reductions in customs duties amounted to about $32,000,000. The same volume of importations should give $186,000,000 receipts from customs. The receipts for the last two months, which my colleague on the committee [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] considers encouraging, $28,000,000, will give only $168,000,000. There is little prospect of an increase in total receipts for 1875 to $305,000,000. I hardly expect to see them above the figures of 1874—$292,000,000.

EXCESSIVE IMPORTATIONS.

I desire to present, for the consideration of the House at this time, some figures bearing upon the condition of the business of the country, and to contrast its present condition and the condition of the Treasury with that of former years.

The first fact that presents itself is, that during a few years past there has been an unprecedented increase in the importation of foreign commodities.

I have a table here showing the amount of imports and exports for a number of years beginning with the year 1855, showing in one column the imports at gold value, and in another the exports, also estimated at gold value, and the excess of exports over imports, or the excess of imports over exports. That table is made up to the year 1873, and there are facts in it which have a bearing upon the future condition of the Treasury, and the revenues to be expected from customs, worthy of consideration in deciding upon our duty in regard to the revenue.

The imports of merchandise for the last three years have risen far above their normal condition. They are, in my judgment, far greater than the country can or may be expected to maintain. They exceeded $642,000,000 during the last fiscal year; indeed, including goods withdrawn from warehouses and directly imported, the amount as shown by the home-consumption statement was $682,000,000. That amount of commodities went into the consumption of the country, being over $200,000,000 in excess of the imports of 1870.

Statement of net imports, less re-exports, and exports, and excesses, each of the other, from 1855 to 1873, inclusive.

Year.	Net imports, less re-exports.	Exports, gold value.	Excess of exports over imports.	Excess of imports over exports.
1855	$233, 020, 227	$246, 708, 553	$13, 688, 326
1856	298, 261, 364	310, 586, 330	22, 324, 966

1864	309, 308, 194	243, 977, 589		65, 330, 605
1865	216, 441, 495	197, 092, 093		19, 349, 402
1867	391, 121, 801	337, 560, 517		53, 561, 284
1868	351, 214, 010	353, 135, 875	1, 921, 865
1869	411, 896, 374	318, 082, 663		93, 813, 711
1870	431, 950, 423	420, 500, 275		11, 450, 148
1871	513, 033, 809	512, 802, 267		231, 542
1873	635, 467, 636	578, 938, 985		56, 528, 651

Gentlemen will have noticed that notwithstanding we have reduced our tariff from year to year, the imports have not only been increased but also the customs receipts up to within the last year or two. But when we compare these imports with the exports we find that since the year 1864 the imports have exceeded the exports at a gold value, inclusive of the gold coin and bullion that have been exported, by over $400,000,000. We have not only imported $400,000,000 worth of merchandise and commodities more than we have exported, but in addition three or four hundred millions of coin; and I include that as one of our exports because it is one of the products of the country, just as much as any other product that comes from the soil or from the mines of the country. Well, now, under this state of things, is it likely that the imports will continue to that extent? I think not.

1857 AND 1873 COMPARED.

A parallel has been run between the condition of the country now and its condition in 1857, and there is a similarity in many particulars.

The customs receipts, total revenues, and net ordinary expenditures for three years prior to the close of the fiscal year ending 1846, and for five years prior to the year ending 1857, will appear in the following exhibit from Treasury reports:

Year.	Customs receipts.	Total receipts.	Net ordinary expenditures.
1844	$16, 183, 570 94	$29, 320, 707 78	$30, 650, 108 01
1846	26, 712, 667 87	29, 699, 967 74	26, 418, 459 59

The receipts and expenditures rose under the tariff of 1846 to the following figures:

Year.	Customs receipts.	Total receipts.	Net ordinary expenditures.
1853	$58, 931, 865 52	$61, 483, 739 31	$44, 678, 156 35
1854	64, 224, 190 27	73, 800, 341 40	51, 142, 138 42
1855	53, 025, 794 21	65, 350, 574 68	56, 312, 097 72

There had been at that time a large increase of importation and business, as the tables clearly show. The balance of trade was in our favor from the year 1855 to the year 1860, and notwithstanding that we were reducing our public debt largely. The customs duties which, in 1844 amounted to $16,000,000, in 1845 to $27,000,000, and 1846 to $26,000,000, amounted in 1853, under what was called the low tariff of 1846, to $49,000,000 and in 1857 to $63,000,000. During those years the imports were less than the exports.

As imports increased the public debt, largely augmented by the Mexican war, diminished. Contrast the diminution of the one with the swelling volume of the other:

Year.	Public debt.	Net imports.	Year.	Public debt.	Net imports.
1844	$23, 461, 652 50	$96, 950, 168	1853	$59, 803, 117 70	$250, 420, 187
1845	15, 925, 303 01	101, 907, 734	1854	42, 242, 222 42	280, 813, 867
1846	15, 550, 200 97	110, 345, 174	1855	35, 586, 958 56	233, 020, 227

In six years the public debt had been reduced from $68,304,796.02 to $28,699,831.85—nearly $40,000,000. At the same rate of reduction in four years it would be extinguished.

In 1853 it was $59,000,000; in 1854, $42,000,000; in 1855, $35,000,000; in 1856, $32,000,000, and in 1857, $28,000,000. It seemed unnecessary to continue the taxation at the rate imposed, although not excessive. In 1857 Congress thought it expedient, wise, and safe to reduce the tariff. Duties on imports were lowered and many dutiable articles made free. In their judgment they had every reason to believe at that time that the receipts from customs and other sources would be sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government. But such was not the case, from two causes: one an increase in the expenditures of the Government; another, a diminution of the amount of commodities imported. The amount of imports in 1856 was $298,000,000; in 1857, $336,000,000; in 1858, $252,000,000; in 1859, $318,000,000; in 1860, $335,000,000; and in 1861, $332,000,000. And it did not recover from the panic of 1857 in part, perhaps in part because of the war, nor did importations again reach to the figures of 1857, until the year 1866.

The falling off of the revenue during the present fiscal year has been chiefly in customs receipts; and the importation of articles paying high rates of duties, such as iron, silk goods, articles of luxury, &c., has notably diminished.

I append a table showing the currency value of some of the leading commodities of the country exported during the last few years to foreign countries:

DIMINISHED IMPORTATION TO BE EXPECTED.

Now, in my judgment, we may expect a diminished importation for the future. For the last eight years the average exports at currency value have been only $515,000,000; reduce that amount to coin value and you will have, perhaps, something from $470,000,000 to $480,000,000. We cannot continually import largely in excess of our exports under the laws of trade or the course of business. Our exports must largely increase or our imports largely diminish. For these reasons I think that our imports will probably be much below $600,000,000, probably not exceed an average of $550,000,000, if they reach that figure. True, the receipts will probably continue to increase with the growth of the country. But there is this to be considered, that as the revenues increase by reason of the growth of the country, or of the elasticity, so called, of the revenue, the expenditures, for the same reason and under the same law referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in remarks he made during the last Congress, will also annually and unavoidably increase.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] has stated to the House that, in his judgment, the necessary unavoidable expenditures of the Government for the next fiscal year, exclusive of any payment upon the sinking fund, will amount to $270,000,000. The interest on the public debt, including the interest upon the Pacific Railroad bonds, which the Government has to pay, and which will be about $3,000,000, will amount to $101,000,000. That would leave the necessary and unavoidable expenditures of the Government, aside from that required for the interest and principal of the debt, about $169,000,000, or $170,000,000. But still, with the addition to the Treasury resources from estimates I have made, there must, it seems to me, upon the basis of expenditures estimated to be required by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, as in his judgment the lowest sum possible to carry on the Government during the next fiscal year, be a deficit, unless we have reason to expect that from some cause the receipts into the Treasury will exceed what they have been for the last fiscal year, or what they are at the present time. There must be a reduction of expenditures below the limit he assigns if increased taxation is to be avoided.

Now, I have taken the pains to look over a few years to see what have been the appropriations made by Congress. During the last six years I believe we had as members on the Committee on Appropriations men who have acquired a national reputation. If I may refer to them by name, there was one from my own State, known as "the watch-dog of the Treasury," (Mr. Washburne, our present minister to France,) because he opposed all unnecessary expenditures. Go back to the time when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Fortieth Congress; go back to the Forty-first Congress, when our present distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] was then the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and was supported by members of his committee in watching the expenditures, Take also the time when the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was chairman of that committee [Mr. GARFIELD] for the Forty-second Congress. During those years you will find that the average of the annual appropriations was $166,000,000, including the direct appropriations made during the year, and the deficiency appropriations made subsequently for those years. I have here a statement of the actual appropriations, which do not include the permanent appropriations, which would swell the amount by $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. The amount now appropriated for the customs, and which was not then included in the appropriations, is not included in the statement.

I desire to call attention to these figures, because they refute and disprove conclusively the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] a few moments ago, that Congress just preceding an election appropriates a small amount, and then after the elections the republican Congress makes up by appropriating large amounts in deficiency bills. The appropriations for the year 1868 were made during the Congress that assembled in December, 1866. The appropriations made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, were made in the year 1868. And I invite the attention of gentlemen to these tables.

The minimum appropriations were after and not before presidential and congressional elections. There was not a show of economy in the appropriations before the election, followed by large deficiency bills subsequent to the election.

Statement (including deficiencies) of appropriations made for the years 1868 to 1874, inclusive.

Yearly average, $166,003,357.20.

I have no fault to find with any gentleman who seeks to remedy the present condition of the Treasury by reducing expenditures. I do not know but that economy alone will bring relief; I hope it will, and am ready to aid efforts in that direction.

It was not my judgment in the last Congress, nor that of a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, that so great a reduction should be made in the revenues as was effected by the legislation of 1872. The Committee on Ways and Means in reporting their bill to the House proposed a reduction of only about $32,000,000. The proposed reductions on the basis of quantities imported and internal taxes received during the preceding year were estimated as follows:

Tea		$2, 348, 639
Coffee		2, 949, 309
Coal		322, 881
Salt		615, 522
Leather		529, 258
Iron, steel, and manufactures thereof		2, 880, 762
Wool and woolens		5, 517, 275
Cotton manufactures		788, 724
Copper, and manufactures of		39, 611
Lumber		761, 801
Chemicals, drugs, &c		584, 862
All other articles		29, 127
Free list		1, 584, 667
		18, 952, 438
Internal revenue:
Tobacco	$6, 720, 000
Gas	2, 573, 123
Bank-checks	1, 250, 000
Matches	2, 250, 000
Agreement stamps	100, 000

At that session, prior to the introduction of the committee's bill, I sustained the views then expressed by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DAWES,] insisting that it was unsafe and unwise to deplete the Treasury to the extent demanded by others. I urged that from unexpected changes in the business condition of the country and from unforeseen causes the revenues might be found as they were subsequent to 1857, insufficient to maintain the credit of the Government, inadequate to defray its actual necessary expenses and meet the yearly demands of the sinking fund.

The House was impatient to reduce revenues. It was popular to repeal taxes regardless of the necessities of the Treasury. The duties were wholly removed from tea and coffee. The conservatism even of members of the committee was shaken. The chairman of the committee himself criticised the reduction proposed as not sufficient. He said, when reporting the bill and expressing his own preference for a total repeal of internal taxes except upon tobacco and spirituous and fermented liquors, and for a larger and broader free list than the bill contained:

> And I would have preferred in doing this that the aggregate of the reductions should have reached, as I hoped it might, instead of the sum of $31,845,561 at least forty to forty-five million dollars, which I believe the revenues of the future will justify.

The bill passed the House making the reductions as estimated on—

Dutiable articles	$11, 076, 629
Free list	2, 676, 093
Tea and coffee free	15, 893, 846
Total customs	29, 645, 778
Internal revenue	13, 988, 000
Total reduction	43, 633, 778

The Senate modified and increased the amount of reduction both in customs and internal taxes, and finally both Houses agreed to a conference report, and passed the bill as it now stands in the law, making an estimated reduction as then explained by the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in—

Customs duties	$31, 669, 259
Total reduction	53, 057, 259

The estimated reductions of the laws of 1872 exceeded the amount recommended by the majority report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress by over $21,000,000. It is true that these reductions relieved taxation to an equal extent, and in case of many of the customs duties afforded still greater relief to consumers of similar products. But I do not propose at this time to discuss that subject.

TEA AND COFFEE.

There are many points which, in an hour's time, one can but touch upon. Some of these it would be interesting to discuss, but I do not propose to trespass upon the time of other gentlemen. I will, however, in this connection, notice a remark made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] and which has been reiterated here by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It is a matter which will be pertinent to the discussion, and which we may hereafter be called to consider, perhaps in this Congress, if we find that we cannot keep down expenditures. In that case it may become our duty to decide how we shall provide revenue. When that question comes up, it will be pertinent to inquire, after examining the history of our legislation, what effect it has had upon the business of the country.

It has been stated here by the gentlemen to whom I have referred that the removal of duties on tea and coffee caused no reduction in the price of those articles to the consumer. I want to say here, and I challenge denial or contradiction, that figures taken from the market reports show that such is not the case. I do not say this as an argument against the reimposition of those duties, but to correct a statement that is made a basis of argument here and elsewhere.

I have here the prices for July and August of the various grades of coffee, showing the prices in 1872, when the act went into effect. In June the price of Rio coffee was 21.17 cents per pound, and in July it was 18.17, a reduction of 3 cents, just the duty repealed. The act went into effect on the 1st day of July. It is true that since then the price has increased, and that it is now much higher, having been in December 23.18 cents. In consequence of short crops the price has been increasing; but it is not the fact that the price did not fall with the decrease of duty.

ECONOMY.

I have no criticism to make upon those gentlemen who point out specific and adequate economical measures, or the details and items whereby a Treasury balance can be maintained, and the receipts made sufficient to defray the necessary expenditures of the Government.

There were one or two suggestions made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in reference to public expenditures indicating action for Congress, methods by which economical purposes could be carried into effect, to which I desire at this time to call the attention of the House. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] suggested that there would be, according to the Treasury statement, a deficit somewhere in the neighborhood of $50,000,000. I think that was his conclusion—from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000, on the Treasury showing. Now, if that is the condition of the Treasury, if it will lack $40,000,000, we ought to be very glad to have pointed out to us in what way we can save the $40,000,000.

PUBLIC WORKS.

I have examined some of the items that our chairman has referred to. One is by postponing the prosecution of certain public works. Unnecessary works should be not only postponed, but postponed indefinitely. But it is the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means to look into the future, to consider the probable condition of the Treasury, not only at the end of this fiscal year and the next, but on from year to year. It is not sufficient to postpone these expenditures for this year. If unnecessary, we should dispense with them entirely. I do not know how much we can save in that direction. The Committee on Appropriations propose a reduction of some $11,000,000; and the House, I dare say, will applaud and sustain their effort.

COST OF COLLECTING REVENUE.

Other specific modes of saving were enumerated, one being the reduction in the cost of collecting the revenue. I think the chairman of our committee made a mistake in his statement as to the cost of collecting the revenue for the last few years. I will not stop to read his remarks; but I will say that, upon examination of the finance reports since 1868, I find the following to have been the expenses for collecting the revenue. In 1868 the expenditures were $7,615,675.45; in 1869 the expenses for the same purpose were $5,376,738.13; the importation of merchandise for the same year amounting to $417,000,000. In 1870 the cost of collection was $6,237,000; the amount of importations $435,000,000. In 1871 the cost of collection was $6,560,000; the amount of importations $530,000,000. In 1873 the cost of collection was $7,079,743.42, while the merchandise imported amounted to $642,136,210.

The following statement from the Treasury reports shows the cost of collecting the customs duties and the value of imported merchandise:

Cost of collecting the customs duties, &c.

Year.	Expenses of collection.	Value of imported merchandise.
1868	$7, 615, 675 45	$357, 436, 440 00
1869	5, 376, 738 13	417, 506, 379 00
1870	6, 237, 137 25	435, 958, 408 00
1871	6, 560, 672 61	520, 223, 684 00

Now, it is not fair to judge the administration of the Government, either its extravagance or its economy, by the amount expended in the collection of customs duties, unless you compare therewith, as I have done, the amount collected. A portion of these imports are of course free goods; but these free goods go in great part through the same formalities as dutiable goods. They must be entered, they must be invoiced, they must be examined; nearly the same amount of machinery is required in the importation of free goods as in the importation of dutiable goods. The expenditures for collecting customs have not kept pace with the increase of merchandise imported; nor have they kept pace with the increase of dutiable goods imported; and while the expenditures during the last four years have increased only about one-seventh, the importations have increased 50 per cent., being about $435,000,000 in value in 1870, and $642,000,000 in value in 1873. If the expenses amounted to the sum of $8,000,000 for 1873, as stated, the increase would even then be far below the proportionate increase of importations.

Perhaps the distributive share of fines, penalties, &c., may have been treated as Treasury expenditures, but those must vary and increase from year to year with the amount of frauds detected and penalties and forfeitures incurred during each year. They are no legitimate expenses, to be charged up and compared with former years as proof of the extravagance in collecting customs. The amount of distributive shares of fines, penalties, and forfeitures for the last five fiscal years has been as follows:

1873	626, 156

An equal amount, besides all unpaid duties, has accrued from this source to the Treasury.

REDUCTION OF CUSTOMS DISTRICTS.

There was another suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, upon this point—the abolition of unnecessary customs districts. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] has stated that the committee were already considering the subject, and will not hesitate upon examination to recommend the abolition of useless custom-houses or customs districts wherever in the interest of economy they can be dispensed with to the public advantage. But while I do not know what may be the case in respect to the possibilities of reducing the districts on the sea-board, I say that when you come to the Mississippi Valley there is one consideration that the House and the gentleman himself should bear in mind. As long ago as 1832, going back to the old democratic administrations, there were established in the collection district of New Orleans, which was a port of entry, ports of delivery for the convenience of the people as well as the interests of the Government. These ports of delivery were established upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries from point to point, extending to the eastern, western, and northern branches of the river, reaching in one case to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on the east, and as far as the settlements and commerce had extended on the north and west, for the delivery of goods which were simply entered at the custom-house at New Orleans and were allowed to pass on in bond, the duties being paid either at the port of entry or the port of delivery, as might be found most convenient for the shipper or the business of the country. At the same time certain districts were established, not so much for the collection of customs duties as for the regulation of the great navigation interests of the Mississippi, the tonnage upon that river amounting to a large percentage of the tonnage of the country; all this navigation being regulated and controlled by the laws of the United States, vessels being required to be licensed and enrolled in the proper districts to pay their hospital dues and tonnage dues.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in his remarks, instanced some of these custom-house districts which paid no customs revenue to the Treasury of the United States. Among them he named one I am familiar with, and perhaps I might enumerate several similarly situated along the Mississippi River. He mentioned one at Galena, which was established in 1852, when—and I say that for the benefit of my democratic colleagues and friends—Mr. Campbell, a democrat, represented that district upon this floor. They established a district there, made Galena the port of delivery, and, as is usual in those cases, gave the surveyor—which all the surveyors, I believe, on those waters still have, except at ports of delivery, created within late years—the enormous and extravagant salary of $350 a year and his fees. Well, now, I find that port, named as one of the non-paying and useless ports, actually paid within the last five years into the Treasury $42,000 collected from inspection, licensing of pilots and engineers, tonnage duty, fines, forfeitures, marine-hospital fees, &c., while the expenses were only $5,620.

Here is the exhibit that the Treasury reports show for the custom-house at Galena:

Receipts for past five fiscal years.

Source.	1869.	1870.	1871.	1872.	1873.
Tonnage duty	$4, 158 19	$4, 095 88
Inspection of vessels	985 08	980 41	$875 19	$589 15	$326 93
Marine-hospital fees	1, 215 99	1, 023 45	1, 527 40	2, 251 17	4, 375 00
Licensing pilots and engineers	3, 140 00	3, 120 00	3, 700 00	3, 965 00	578 83
Miscellaneous	2, 000 00	1, 060 00	1, 328 95	1, 180 00	340 00
Total	11, 499 26	10, 279 74	7, 431 54	7, 985 32	5, 620 76

Total receipts for five years	$42, 967 37
Expenditures for five years, at $959 per year	4, 795 00
Balance covered into United States Treasury	38, 172 37

I only call attention to this as a criticism on the table in the printed remarks of the chairman presented, so far as relates to one district with which I am familiar; and while I am not familiar with all the districts of the country, I am told that the same facts exist in regard to quite a number of the districts referred to. Possibly we shall find that the necessity and business which required at an early day the establishment, has justified the maintenance of most, if not all, the customs districts, so that extravagance in that particular is in appearance more than reality. The closing of the first seventy ports he enumerated would save $300,000 disbursed to employés. But the trade and commerce of the country might be discommoded and damaged to a larger amount.

CONSOLIDATING NAVY-YARDS.

The consolidation of navy-yards was suggested. I shall not have time, Mr. Speaker to discuss that question. I think the specific saving which the gentleman from Massachusetts claimed would result from the proposed consolidation was $86,000. It would be well to try to save that much. "Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves," is the old adage. That will not, however, reach a great way toward meeting the millions of deficit which the Treasury receipts seemed to threaten.

PAYING PENSIONS.

Another proposition was to reduce the fees of pension agents. Well, if we can save the poor pensioners anything by a modification of our laws, let us do it. I recollect when we passed that law in 1870, when it was proposed to have the postmasters pay the pensions, Mr. Benjamin, of Missouri, then the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, one of the most economical members we ever had in this House, insisted this was the best method for the Government to prevent fraud, and as economical as any method that could be proposed. And the Committee on Pensions, who are competent to decide upon that question, I presume, will be prepared to discuss it whenever it comes before the House. But for the present I only want to say this: that I do not see how that is going to replenish or keep up the Treasury resources when the pension agents' fees cannot go into the Treasury and have no connection with it.

POST-OFFICE EXPENDITURES.

As regards the post-office expenditure, I cannot stop to dwell upon that. I know that the expenditures in the Post-Office Department have increased, and so have the mail facilities. The time in which letters and newspapers are carried from New York City to Chicago has been reduced now to less than two days, and I prophesy that before this year expires, or at least within a very few years, we shall see the mails carried between Chicago and New York in a much less time. Those facilities are for the advantage of the people, but of course they cost something.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment at this point I would say that it is now in contemplation to put on a fast post-office train between New York and Chicago that shall make that distance in twenty-four hours, and I suppose it will be done before the close of this quarter. I hope it will.

Mr. BURCHARD. If that is done it will be worth millions to the business of the country. To shorten the time between those two important commercial points, will be a benefit not merely to Chicago, but to the whole Northwest, the mails of which pass through that city. And it is necessary with the growth of the country to increase to some extent some of those expenditures, practicing at the same time a wise economy. If there be any useless expenditure cut it off.

MATURING OBLIGATIONS TO BE PROVIDED FOR.

But I shall not detain the House longer upon this branch of the subject, because I wish to present now another phase of this discussion. The exhibit of the Treasury that has been made by other gentlemen upon this floor has presented to their minds, or has suggested to gentlemen who have not yet addressed the House, that the way to meet the deficiency in the Treasury is to issue the obligations of the Government, either in notes intended to circulate as money or in the form of bonds. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to that, for two or three reasons. I do not think we can afford to do it. I found, and you will find on looking at the debt statement, that within eight years of the present time a large amount of the bonded debt of the Government becomes absolutely due and payable.

When will the obligations of the Government, payable in the future, fall due? What provision is necessary to meet maturing indebtedness? Look at the last Treasury statement. Its exhibit shows the following:

Statement for the month of February, 1874, of the public debt bearing interest in coin.

Title of loan.	Rate of interest.	After what time redeemable.	When payable.	Total.
	Per cent.
Loan of 1858	5	Jan. 1, 1874		$260,000 00
Loan of February, 1861	6		Dec. 31, 1880	18,415,000 00
Oregon war debt	6		July 1, 1881	945,000 00
Loan of July and Aug., 1861	6	June 30, 1881		189,321,350 00
Five-twenties of 1862	6	May 1, 1867	May 1, 1882	168,593,150 00
Loan of 1863, ('81's)	6	June 30, 1881		75,000,000 00
Ten-forties of 1864	5	March 1, 1874	March 1, 1904	194,567,300 00
Five-twenties, March, 1864	6	Nov. 1, 1869	Nov. 1, 1884	946,600 00
Five-twenties, June, 1864	6	Nov. 1, 1869	Nov. 1, 1884	58,046,200 00
Five-twenties of 1865	6	Nov. 1, 1870	Nov. 1, 1885	152,634,350 00
Consols of 1865	6	July 1, 1870	July 1, 1885	202,633,100 00
Consols of 1867	6	July 1, 1872	July 1, 1887	310,654,400 00
Consols of 1868	6	July 1, 1873	July 1, 1888	37,474,000 00
Funded loan of 1881	5	May 1, 1881		310,870,250 00
Funded loan of 1886	4½	May 1, 1886
Funded loan of 1901	4	May 1, 1901
Total				1,720,360,700 00

These bonds mature within the following years:

Eight years, absolutely payable 6 per cents	$192,018,350
Eight years, payable at pleasure 6 per cents	264,321,350
Eight years, payable at pleasure 5 per cents	505,221,700
Ten years, absolutely payable 6 per cents	58,992,800
Eleven years, absolutely payable 6 per cents	355,267,450
Thirteen years, absolutely payable 6 per cents	310,654,400
Fourteen years, absolutely payable 6 per cents	37,474,000

The principal of the interest-bearing indebtedness, payable in coin, amounts to $1,720,360,700, $1,214,663,150 of which bears interest at 6 per cent., and $505,000,000 at 5 per cent. That statement shows that within eight years there become absolutely payable $192,000,000 of the 6 per cent. bonds, and in the same time, at the pleasure of the Government, $264,321,000 of 6 per cent. and $505,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds. In ten years $58,000,000 more of the 6 per cent. bonds become due absolutely; in eleven years, $355,000,000; in thirteen years, $310,000,000; and in fourteen years, $37,000,000. These become due absolutely, besides about $769,000,000 becoming due within that time at the pleasure of the Government.

But for the able management of the Treasury by the late Secretary, within eight years over $500,000,000 matured 6 per cent. bonds would have to be provided for.

By prudent financial legislation in accordance with his policy, and negotiations protracted but successful, over $300,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds absolutely payable were converted into 5 per cent. bonds payable after ten years at the pleasure of the Government.

While the syndicate seems to have brought little profits to its members, it not only relieved the people by a reduction of the annual interest burden, but provided in advance and postponed the payment of maturing obligations which the revenues will not suffice nor the sinking fund be able to discharge.

SINKING FUND.

The sinking fund approximately requires for the present year about $29,000,000, and for the next fiscal year $30,000,000, the requirement of the sinking fund being 1 per cent. upon the interest of the public debt, and the interest upon so much of the sinking fund as has been already paid. If, then, we pay our debts by paying the 6 per cent. bonds, there will be an addition to the sinking fund each year of about 5 per cent. of itself.

The following is a statement of estimated amount required to be paid each year on the sinking-fund account if the public debt is diminished each year by redemption of 6 per cent. bonds to the amount of the sinking fund:

Fiscal years—	Annual amount.	Total.
1875	$29,918,856
1876	31,414,798	$61,433,654
1877	32,985,537	94,419,191
1878	34,634,814	129,054,005
1879	36,365,555	165,419,560
1880	38,183,833	203,603,393
1881	40,093,024	243,696,417
1882	42,097,675	285,794,092
1883	44,202,558	329,996,650
1884	46,412,570	376,410,220
1885	48,733,198	425,143,418
1886	51,169,857	476,313,275

The sinking fund will require more and more every year, and will, I think, keep pace with the elasticity of the revenue and the growth of the country. The sinking fund itself, at the end of eight years, will lack $160,000,000 of paying the 6 per cent. bonds then due at the pleasure of the Government. What must the Government do? If it cannot pay them off or refund them at a lower rate of interest the bonds must run on at 6 per cent. interest. At the end of eleven years $600,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds will have become absolutely due, and the sinking fund will then be nearly two hundred millions short of paying what we shall be required at that time to pay to meet the requirements of the sinking fund, for the payment of which in the dark hours of our nation's history we solemnly pledged the Government and the faith of the nation. Now, we must provide for that $200,000,000 in one of two ways. We must do it either by keeping up the credit and faith of the Government and our pledges, so that we can refund our debt at a lower rate of interest or else by putting from year to year taxation so high that we will have by that time, or before that time, money enough to pay it. I for one, not only on principle but from policy, am in favor of maintaining the credit and honor of the Government. The honor of a nation is not like that of an individual, although that is sacred to each man personally.

What does the sinking fund require?

I will read to the House the act of February 25, 1862. It substantially required customs duties to be paid in coin, and so much as might be necessary for the payment in each year of 1 per cent. of the entire debt, and the interest on such payment to be applied annually to the reduction of the debt.

CREATION OF THE SINKING FUND.

The act authorized the issue of legal-tender notes and five-twenty 6 per cent. bonds. It was entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States."

Section 5 provided—

That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin or in notes payable on demand, heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Secondly. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made in each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Thirdly. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

This pledge, given by the nation to all subsequent purchasers and holders of its obligations, requires collection of duties in coin sufficient, first, for the payment in coin of the interest on bonds and notes of the United States; secondly, to purchase or pay in each fiscal year 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States and the interest upon the yearly amount so purchased or paid.

What is meant by payment or purchase yearly of 1 per cent. of the entire debt, to which sufficient customs duties, payable in coin, are pledged? It means the reduction of the debt each year to that extent. Is the promise performed by the substitution of one form of obligation for another? Is national faith maintained if revennes are permitted to fall below necessary expenditures?

The law requires the purchase or payment in each year of 1 per cent. of the entire debt. It does not specify the bonded debt. It says the entire debt. It was prospective. It was intended to secure the funding of the floating debt, to keep up the credit of the legal-tender notes, and to facilitate their conversion into United States bonds.

The payment on the sinking-fund account was to be made within each fiscal year after July 1, 1862. It was to commence after that date and continue until the debt was discharged.

The payment was to be made in each year out of the coin received from customs duties set apart for that purpose.

Shall we have performed our duty as legislators and maintained the credit and honor of the nation if, instead of reducing the debt annually by the amount required for the sinking fund, we are content with the issue of additional obligations to meet current expenditures? No; every honest debtor would say no. If revenues are decreasing, we must consider whether the deficit will be temporary or permanent. Expenditures should be kept at all events at the lowest economical limit, and, if then, in excess of the probable annual income, we must provide additional revenues. Taxation is better than dishonor.

PRACTICAL DUTY.

Commercial integrity is the pride of the merchant. Strong men, whose good names have been assailed and honor impeached, have drooped and sickened and died broken-hearted. Reverence and love for one's native city or State is praiseworthy; but respect and zeal for national reputation and honor are noble and patriotic. Let us ever glory in and cherish and sustain the just pride Americans take in their country's past history and character. Men willingly lay down their lives fighting for the honor of their country. It should be the patriotic feeling of every soul that the honor and credit of the Government must be sustained. To do this, the credit and faith of the nation, which it pledged in regard to the sinking fund, must be religiously maintained.

It is proposed that the people shall assemble at the birthplace of the Republic to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. What will be their proudest boast? Will it be their country's vast extent of territory; its rapid increase in population; its magnificent development in material resources; its increased facilities for intercourse between distant cities, and the commercial interchange of products; its wide diffusion of knowledge and its splendid systems for free education? These indeed will be matters of pride and gratulation. They are, however, but indices, and not essential elements of national character and real greatness. Some of the smallest states have been the most illustrious recorded on the page of history. A nation possessing all these, but lacking national morality, integrity, and honesty, will not be grand and truly great. On that occasion it will be a prouder boast, and the highest national honor, that the United States, under all circumstances and under and in spite of every temptation, has been true to its honor and plighted word; that it has been scrupulous to maintain its solemn engagements not only with other nations but with private individuals.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, as I am entitled to the floor when the House takes up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, in which the whole range of subjects relating to the expenditures of the Government can be legitimately discussed, and as I stand pledged then to show wasteful extravagance in expenditures, I will avoid now, as carefully as I can, all reference to the questions as to which I then intend to be heard, and confine myself to what I consider the legitimate and proper means of supplying the wants of the Government and the people, with such suggestions thereon as may occur to me. My remarks will of course be somewhat disconnected, and I ask pardon for not having a speech prepared.

I think it was well for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to pursue the course he did when he laid this little tax bill before the House. It was due not only to himself, but to his committee, that he should lay before the country not only the condition of the Treasury, but the means by which our revenues were being squandered.

I agree with much that he said. I think he proved reckless extravagance, and wasteful, if not corrupt, administration of public affairs against his political associates; and he certainly proved that he and others who have for years controlled legislation, backed as they are and have been always by an overwhelming party majority, have been either false to the great trusts confided to them or incapable of managing properly interests so vast, when he had to confess before the country and the world that the whole management of public affairs is going from bad to worse year by year.

Why are these things so? Because, as the party leaders on the other side can no longer conceal and hardly deny, a set of vampires, in the form of rings, monopolists, bankers, bondholders, post-office and Treasury leeches, custom-house, navy-yard, and other corruptionsists, have fastened themselves on the body-politic, and are silently but surely sucking the life-blood from a disorganized, impoverished, and helpless people.

So long as the downtrodden masses could be made to feel either that there was danger in making a change in the administration of public affairs, or that their material prosperity would be preserved and maintained notwithstanding all they saw and felt of maladministration, the party leaders were secure; but when the panic of last summer brought poverty to their doors in the midst of bountiful harvests, when the workshops were closed, and the wives and children of men ready and willing to labor were crying for bread, people began to look into the causes which produced calamities and sufferings like these in a way they had never looked before, and they began to understand that great and flagrant wrongs had been done, and grievous evils heaped upon them by the men they had trusted with power.

The leaders of the party may well quail; they may cry aloud now for retrenchment and reform. They cannot reform if they would, and the corruptionists who control even the party leaders would not if they could.

After all the exultations and laudations which the partisan press—paid, of course, liberally for its flattery—had from day to day for years poured out in praise of the magnificent fiscal policy whereby the national debt was being reduced with such wonderful rapidity, a clap of thunder from a cloudless sky could not have startled the country more than the announcement not only that the national debt was being increased, but that the Treasury of the United States was in imminent danger of bankruptcy.

No sooner had Congress convened than the Secretary of the Treasury rushed to the Committee on Ways and Means with a demand for increased taxation—$42,000,000 was the amount suggested, if not distinctly demanded; and the fact was developed that the Secretary, without consulting Congress, was reissuing legal-tender notes which by law he had been required to retire, and when retired was peremptorily ordered to cancel. The committee was thus met at the very threshold of its proceedings and deliberations with serious embarrassments.

I may not speak for all the members of that committee; each will, by speech or vote, declare his purpose; but for myself I determined, after as full investigation as I could make, that it was not necessary either to increase the burdens of the people by taxation, or to create any more interest-bearing debt, and I avowed my determination promptly on the floor not to vote for either.

While that was so, I did not see my way clearly in what I greatly desired, the reduction of taxation, except in such cases as by the removal of protection the revenue would certainly be increased by reduction. That did not apply to internal-revenue taxation; so that I was forced to report against the removal of the taxes on matches and bank-check stamps, much as I desired the removal of them, because I could not see how $5,100,000, the amount which would be lost to the Treasury, could be supplied by any act Congress would be likely to pass; and I was not prepared to say that it was safe to reduce the revenue even to that extent, in that form, unless it was otherwise supplied.

A careful examination into the condition of the finances developed to my mind that the Secretary had lost his head; he had not rallied from the panic of last September; he had been demoralized by the failure of what he thought were mighty efforts to restore confidence. His grand scheme to return to specie payments by the distribution of a few bags of silver was a miserable and discreditable abortion; while the $14,000,000 he flung into the maelstrom of Wall street in September, to stop the panic, was like pouring water from a cup to produce a flood in the Mississippi. Frightened by his failures, his last resource was to cling with a miser's grip to the gold he had in the Treasury; and in order to save it he reissued, as his necessities required it, $25,000,000 of the $44,000,000 of legal-tender notes which had been retired and had been canceled by the act of April 12, 1866. He facetiously calls it a reserve—as if any Congress, or any set of men fit to be outside the bounds of a lunatic asylum would trust any Secretary of the Treasury with despotic power over $44,000,000 of the currency of the country, as a reserve to be used or not as he saw fit.

I was in Congress in February, 1868, when the law prohibiting further contraction was passed, and $356,000,000 were thereby fixed as the volume of legal-tenders. So were many of you. The relations of President Johnson and his Cabinet to Congress at that time were anything but confidential. Articles of impeachment were being urged against the President. His Cabinet—at least his Secretary of the Treasury—was his friend. Will any man pretend that Congress intended, in the then condition of things, to give the President or his Secretary power to contract or expand the currency to the extent of $44,000,000? The letter of the law negatives such an idea, the object to be attained disproves it, and the relations of the executive and legislative departments confirm the construction I maintain.

The report of the Committee on Finance of the Senate of the United States, made January 14, 1873, (see Report No. 275, third session Forty-second Congress,) after a thorough and exhaustive review of all the laws bearing upon the question, concludes thus:

A power over the currency so wide-reaching as the power to issue $44,000,000 of new legal-tender notes is one that ought not to rest upon implication. It should not rest upon a doubtful construction of words in a law passed three years before, and used in regard to loans negotiated under widely different circumstances. Congress might well grant a power during war that it would not confer in peace. The full exercise of such a power would undoubtedly affect the nominal value of all property in the United States to the extent of at least 10 per cent., and the real value or burden as between debtor and creditor of at least 10 per cent. on all contracts to be performed in futuro. Such a power, if given, would be by clear and unambiguous language, and should not be inferred by subtile reasoning, or depend upon the pressure of interested parties or changing views of public policy.

In all questions of construction as to the extent of power conferred by law in matters which affect the public credit or public securities, a reasonable doubt as to a grant of power should be held to exclude it. After a careful review of the subject, your committee are of the opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury has not the power to issue United States notes in excess of $356,000,000, outstanding when the act of February 4, 1868, took effect, but he may replace with new notes all mutilated or defaced notes, and, within the limit of $356,000,000, may exchange or replace new notes for old ones.

And your committee report the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the Secretary of the Treasury has not the power, under existing law, to issue United States notes for any portion of the forty-four millions of the United States notes retired and canceled under the act approved April 12, 1866.

Sir, such a report as that, from such a committee, ought to have been conclusive on any Secretary, or any executive officer, as to the true meaning and construction of an act of Congress; and it would have been under any other administration than this. Now, for the first time in our history, executive officers seem to take pride and pleasure in defying all law, and in usurping power and authority in defiance of the representatives of the people.

When the President of the United States can, as he did a few years ago, undertake to re-reconstruct the Empire State of the South in spite of Congress; when by executive orders General Terry could place a railroad employé in the speaker's chair of the house of representatives of the State of Georgia, to protect and promote the schemes of men like Bullock and Blodgett in their efforts to destroy popular rights and honest administration; when he and his Attorney-General can, as they did a year ago, by force of arms and by pretended judicial orders, prepared and dictated from Washington, overthrow the once proud State of Louisiana, and lay her prostrate at the feet of their minions, what can be expected from the chiefs of staff? "Like master, like man," is an old, homely adage, but it illustrates the actual state of things now.

The Secretary of the Navy can enlist fifteen hundred men beyond the limit fixed by law, and put them into the Navy of the United States, without even telling Congress that he has done so, till forced by a resolution of the House, passed on my motion, to admit the fact. Executive Document No. 134, first session of this Congress, shows that has been done, not only without a word of remonstrance from the party leaders, but they try to hide it and cover it up. Perhaps they will see now where the $5,000,000, out of the $6,200,000 appropriated for the pay of the Navy for the current fiscal year, which was drawn before the first three months had expired, have gone, when they read the following——

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman allow me a question in regard to what he said a moment ago?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the gentleman think any injury was done to the people of Georgia by General Terry's administration there?

Mr. BECK. I think it was not only a flagrant outrage against civil liberty, but such a usurpation of executive power that if it had been committed by your late unfortunate President, Andrew Johnson, not only would he have been successfully impeached, but there would not have been a man in the Senate of the United States, republican or democrat, who would have dared to vote for his acquittal. That is what I think about it.

I wish my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] was here; I see the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is. They have been trying to explain why it was that over five millions out of the six millions for the annual pay of the Navy were drawn from the Treasury before the 30th day of September. All their explanations were contradictory and incorrect, as the following article will show. I have here a statement from the New York Tribune of the other day—how true it is I do not know—showing that $1,000,000 of that money was in the hands of some banking-house, Jay Cooke & Co., or Cooke, McCulloch & Co., in London; and that the Secretary has had to take old railroad iron to try to secure himself for part of it. Let me read a portion of the article, with his order of October 21, 1873:

At the time of the panic in September last, Jay Cooke & Co., the First Division Company, and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company all went down together. The Secretary of the Navy had a large balance in the hands of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.—about $1,000,000 in all—for the payment of the naval forces in European waters. Mr. McCulloch arrived in New York soon after, and made strenuous exertions to obtain funds to prevent the London house from going down, and also to prevent Secretary Robeson from removing his accounts from them, as Mr. French testified. It was important to the London firm to continue this account, for two reasons: first, the balance was useful to them; and, secondly, if the United States had withdrawn the account the credit of the house would have been destroyed at once all over the world. The warehouse receipts, &c., representing the iron, had been deposited with Drexel, Morgan & Co., and an effort had been made to effect a loan on them, but the negotiations failed on account of the opinion of two lawyers, that under a recent decision of Judge Blatchford, the property was not safe from the creditors of Jay Cooke & Co. The negotiations having failed, the warehouse receipts, representing the iron, were deposited by Drexel, Morgan & Co., on October 20, 1873, with the firm of John Munroe & Co. as trustees for the person or persons who should have a title to them. They were afterward delivered to George F. Cutter, naval paymaster, on the order of the Secretary of the Navy. After several interviews between McCulloch and Secretary Robeson, the latter consented to retain the Government account with the house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., and received a large number of securities, among which were about sixteen hundred tons of iron, part of which was in Buffalo, a part in Du Luth, and a part in New Orleans.

This is the order and the answer of Munroe & Co.

The following correspondence shows the exercise of the right of ownership in the rails by Secretary Robeson:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, October 21, 1873.

GENTLEMEN: Please deliver iron rails held for account, as advised by you, to Pay Director George F. Cutter, New York.

OFFICE OF JOHN MUNROE & CO., BANKERS,
No. 8 Wall street, New York, October 27, 1873.

SIR: In compliance with your order dated 21st instant, we beg to advise that we have handed over to Pay Director George F. Cutter, of this city, the iron rails therein referred to, and hold his receipt for the same.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

JOHN MUNROE & CO.

Hon. GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

It is claimed by the plaintiffs' attorneys that the iron belonging to their clients, and secured from their bonds, can be recovered from the Secretary of the Navy on the ground that, though the warehouse receipts are regular negotiable paper, and therefore perhaps secure in the hands of an innocent holder, the Government can maintain no claim to them, as its officers have no legal right to receive securities for loans. If this plea does not hold good, they claim that the Government must exhaust its claim against the other securities which Cooke & Co. had a right to pledge before using the property of their clients.

Perhaps some account can be given of that transaction by these gentlemen. Perhaps they can account for those things. As to the truth of this matter I personally know nothing.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman claim that a dollar of this money has ever been lost, or has ever been in any danger of being lost?

Mr. BECK. I will ask the gentleman from Maine, for my own information, what these things mean? How does the Secretary of the Navy come to be trading in railroad iron?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know, and I do not care, what the gentleman finds in any newspaper in New York or outside of New York. But I will say this to him, that not a dollar of this fund drawn for the pay of the Navy has ever been lost. Not a dollar of it has ever been in danger of being lost, and the Secretary has never had it placed in any quarter whatever without the amplest security.

Mr. BECK. I will ask the gentleman now, since he seems to know so much about it—I do not profess to know anything—whether or not this railroad iron was taken as security for this money?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There never was any security taken because of any apprehended danger.

Mr. BECK. Was it taken at all? Are these orders genuine or false?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know whether it was taken or not, but I know the Secretary never fails to take ample security—as he should.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary has issued these orders, or somebody has committed forgery.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman complain that the Secretary took security, or what is it that he does complain of?

Mr. BECK. What I complain of is, that he drew out of the Treasury of the United States, in the first three months of this fiscal year, over five millions of the six and a quarter millions appropriated for the pay of the Navy for the whole fiscal year, and put it in a dangerous place, where he had to take security from firms, which for some time at least were supposed to be in danger of becoming insolvent.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman has no warrant for using the word "dangerous."

Mr. BECK. I have warrant for saying that, in regard to the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., they were for weeks believed to be in great danger.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Government has lost nothing by them.

Mr. BECK. And I have warrant for saying that the money of the Government was taken by this administration away from the old and unquestioned banking-house of the Barings, which had served the country faithfully and well since the foundation of the Government, and given to political partisans, such as Henry Clews & Co., where it was no longer safe; and I have warrant for saying that this was done because they were the tools of the Administration. And I will say further, if the gentleman wants to know it, that this very man Clews, and a man by the name of George Opdyke, were the sureties on the official bonds of the defaulting collector Bailey, and that the Government never sued either of them, at least for years after that man had defaulted for large amounts, and had gone to parts unknown. I have here the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury showing this. But I am not to be led away by these things from my line of argument.

I repeat that when the Secretary of the Treasury saw the President in such grave matters disregarding the law, and the Secretary of the Navy doing the same thing, at least in the enlistment of fifteen hundred men, and when he saw $132,000,000, the proceeds of the sale of the property of the people, go into the Bureaus of the War Department, and spent, as they officially certify, in excess of all appropriations made by Congress, he thought he had to do something to distinguish his office and to show that he, too, would no longer be dependent on the Representatives of the people; and when he saw the Postmaster-General, as the Book of Estimates shows, spending this very year $500,000 out of the appropriations made by law for the year 1871—more than two years after the expiration of that fiscal year, and when that money ought to be and was legally in the Treasury, and all these things were done without question by the leaders of the Administration—then the Secretary of the Treasury supposed that he, too, could go on with impunity and defy the law; and, let me tell you gentlemen, never until your party came into power did any Postmaster-General dare to expend all the revenues collected by his Department from the people without asking an appropriation by Congress. If you go back to all the democratic and whig administrations you will find that all the revenues collected by the Post-Office Department from the people were regularly appropriated by Congress; but now they are not charged among the appropriations, in order to make the people believe that you are spending $29,000,000 annually less than you really are. The Secretary of the Interior is trying to keep up with the others as well as he can, but even with his Indian affairs it is hard for him to keep pace with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Treasury has, as gentlemen all know, used a fund of $3,000,000 a year in organizing bureaus and chiefs of staff all through the Treasury Department. There are seven of them now in his own office headed by men who are only legally $1,800 clerks, but who are being paid $3,000, with assistants, who are sometimes $1,400 clerks, and who are paid $2,000 a year. The Secretary has as chiefs of staff and employés in his Department fifteen hundred persons who are not provided for by appropriation bills; and the gentleman from Massachusetts said that only four hundred were provided for by law. But the Treasury Department is a great Department, and $44,000,000 had to be taken to show that the Secretary of the Treasury, too, could act in defiance of law, in defiance of the reports of committees, and that he could put Wall street up or down and rule politics as he saw fit. But, sir, I am again wandering from my subject and must come back to it.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] certainly presented the demands of the Secretary of the Treasury for relief in as forcible and plausible a form as it was possible to do; his presentation of facts and figures was well calculated to alarm the House. Yet when they are carefully examined, there is nothing in them to warrant the demand either for $42,000,000 of additional taxation, or indeed for any taxation whatever, so urgently pressed by the Secretary in his communication to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There were, as the Secretary shows, over $131,000,000 in the Treasury on the 1st of July last, when the current fiscal year began, over $60,000,000 of which were clear surplus and could be used by the Government for any needful purpose. The other $71,000,000 might or might not be called for. It was on deposit; and it is likely that about that sum will always remain in the Treasury as a fund more available then the ordinary deposits in the banks of the country, on which they do business with as much confidence. But count it out altogether, $60,000,000 was the money of the people in their Treasury, under the guardianship of the Secretary, of which $48,000,000 were in gold.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] shows by official figures that from July 1, 1873, to February 1, 1874, the tax-payers had furnished the Secretary with about $166,000,000; and even the Secretary admits that $116,000,000 more will be furnished by them before the 1st of July next, of which not less than $170,000,000 is, or will be, in gold. The Secretary has, besides this, $44,000,000, which he has assumed the right to use in order to enable him to continue to hoard the $48,000,000 of gold he had on the 1st of July last; so that he has, beyond all controversy, $386,000,000 available for the current fiscal year, of which not less then $218,000,000 is in gold.

The total appropriations for the current fiscal year, including, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] took so much pains to prove the other day, the whole amount of the sinking fund, which is all of the national debt we are compelled or ought to provide for, are $319,000,000, which, with the $4,000,000 we were fooled out of in December for the Navy by a false clamor of threatened war, make our total liabilities $323,000,000, of which not exceeding $128,000,000 is in gold, leaving an excess of $64,000,000 in the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year, with the premium on surplus of gold receipts over payments in gold, to wit, $90,000,000, or the difference between $218,000,000 on hand and collected and $128,000,000 paid out for interest on account of sinking fund to be added, making, at 11 per cent., about $10,000,000 more. It is perfectly safe to say that, instead of $116,000,000, as estimated for the five months from February 1 to July 1, not less than $126,000,000 will be received, making $10,000,000 additional. Indeed, $116,000,000 is below the average of the last seven months, when all the energies and industries of the country were paralyzed and prostrated by the panic of last September for at least two months, thus making $84,000,000 in the Treasury July 1, 1874. Since the 1st day of February we have been collecting at a rate which will make $140,000,000 instead of $126,000,000; but for safety I call it the latter sum. Even if the $44,000,000 which the Secretary has, as I think, illegally assumed the right to use is withdrawn, as I hope it will not be, there will be a balance of over $40,000,000 in the Treasury when the fiscal year closes.

It is not pretended that these expenditures will exceed $324,000,000. Indeed, the Department claims that $321,000,000 will be all that will be required for all purposes. Of this $177,000,000 have been paid out or transferred; $66,000,000 more will be needed to complete the service of the year; $42,000,000 are required for interest on the public debt; $7,000,000 for permanent appropriations, and $29,000,000 for the sinking fund. The account would stand thus:

United States Treasury to The People, Dr.

To amount of available cash, July 1, 1873		$60, 000, 000
To amount of proceeds of taxes for the fiscal year		293, 000, 000
To amount of legal-tender notes appropriated by the Secretary		44, 000, 000
To amount of premium on surplus gold		10, 000, 000
Total debit		407, 000, 000
	Cr.
By amount paid to February 1, 1874	$177, 000, 000
By amount owing up to July 1, 1874	66, 000, 000
By amount for unpaid interest	42, 000, 000
By amount permanent appropriations	7, 000, 000
By amount sinking fund	29, 000, 000
Total credit		321, 000, 000
Cash on hand on the 1st of July, 1874		86, 000, 000
Deduct, if you please, the legal-tenders		44, 000, 000
The balance will still be		42, 000, 000

These figures will stand the test of scrutiny; they prove that the demand of the Secretary for an increase of taxation of $42,000,000 in order to enable him to carry on the fiscal affairs of the Government, is wholly unnecessary and uncalled for; and while they may show that it would not be safe now to deprive the Government of the $5,100,000 which would be lost by the repeal of the taxes on matches and checks, because contingencies might arise to curtail receipts of revenue or increase expenditures, they prove that the clamor of bankruptcy staring us in the face, unless more money is raised, is wholly unfounded.

The distinguished chairman of Ways and Means made the following statement in that speech:

> While we have been reducing our receipts on the one side we have been increasing our expenditures at the other. Listen now to the expenditures of this Government since the present administration came into power. The first year the expenses of this Government were $322,865,277.80; in 1870 they were $309,653,560.75; in 1871 they were $292,177,188.25; in 1872 they were $277,517,962.67; in 1873 they were $290,345,245.33; the appropriations for the present year sum up $319,652,644.31. In 1870 we reduced our expenditures to $309,000,000, and we paid $101,601,916.88 of the public debt; in 1871 we brought them down from $309,663,560.75 to $292,177,188.25, and we paid $94,327,764.84 of the public debt; in 1872 we brought them down still further to $277,517,962.67, and we paid $99,960,253.54 of the public debt in addition. In 1873 the expenditures ran up to $290,345,245,33, and we paid but $43,667,630.05 of the public debt. This year our appropriations have gone up from $290,000,000, our expenses for the last year, to $319,000,000, without paying one dollar of the public debt.

This, while a startling and truthful exhibit of the extravagance and reckless waste of public money which characterize the present Administration, and a proof that it is going from bad to worse, year by year and day by day, as it finds that the people can be hoodwinked and duped into submission and obedience, seeks to impress plain people in the country, who have neither leisure nor opportunity to ascertain the facts, that the reduction of the national debt has been a highly creditable party performance, when in fact it has been utterly disgraceful, extravagant, and profligate, as a few official facts and figures, with which I propose to supplement the statements I have read, will show, taken from the finance report for 1873, page 12:

Collections over expenditures		541, 440, 549 61

It will thus be seen that, notwithstanding the enormous expenditures of the Government for the last seven years, the amount coerced from the people which reached the Treasury was yet $541,440,000 greater. More than half of the immense sum collected was in gold, which had to be bought at whatever premium the bondholders and the capitalists could squeeze out of the necessities of the labor and the commerce of the country.

The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on pages 14 and 15, shows that the net ordinary expenditures of the Government in all its departments, and all pensions besides, from 1791 to 1861 inclusive—during which time the war of 1812–'15 was waged with Great Britain, as well as the Mexican war, and all our Indian wars—amounted to the sum of $1,587,444,468.21. If I have erred in addition, the following table will correct me:

Net expenditures of the Government.

It must not be forgotten that, from 1791 to 1861, the revenues of the Post-Office, collected directly by the Department from the people, are all included, while they are all excluded in the statement of expenditures for the last five years, though they averaged over $20,000,000 a year.

When it is observed that over $1,600,000,000 have been expended since the inauguration of General Grant five years ago, independent of the payment either of any part of the principal of the national debt or the sinking fund, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] both agreed the other day, a sum largely more than all the ordinary expenditures of the Government for the seventy years under democratic or whig rule, no wonder the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means warned his party friends power would pass out of their hands, and the day of reckoning could not be postponed, if corruption, extravagance, and extortion were not speedily stopped. While it is a striking commentary on the celebrated speech made by him two years ago, which all the stump orators of his party swore by, in which he tried to show that General Grant's administration had been more economical than that of Mr. Buchanan, which many members here doubtless made the basis of their campaign speeches all over the country, he did not like to show that, after all the enormous expenditures of the last seven years, $541,440,649.61 were still on hand with which to pay the $339,557,565.31 of the national debt which he shows was paid.

Secretary Richardson, in his last report, page 31, states the principal of the bonds redeemed or purchased since they began to buy, in May, 1869, at $323,253,800. But call it what you will—call it $400,000,000, as Senator SHERMAN does, if you please, since 1868—and the fact still remains that the people have been compelled to furnish, and have furnished, ample means, over and above all expenditures, to buy $140,000,000 more than anybody pretends have been bought.

All these immense sums, be it remembered, are exclusive of the $132,000,000, which the Secretary of War, in Executive Document No. 200, second session Forty-second Congress, shows had been obtained by the Bureaus of the War Department from the sales of the horses, mules, wagons, and other war materials of the people, and spent, in excess of all appropriations as well as of the proceeds of the sales of over four hundred of our ships and all sorts of naval stores, amounting to many millions more, which the Secretary of the Navy shows in his report, or reply, Executive Document No. 250, second session Forty-second Congress. And these are only specimens of what all the Departments have done continually.

Next as to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I do not want to allude to his late speech very elaborately just now, for I shall have an hour when his bill comes up; then I hope to be able to pay my respects to him in a kind way. That gentleman, however, took particular pains the other day to show how economical we have been, how saving we have been; he showed how in 1863 we repealed customs duties to the amount of $65,000,000; in 1838 to the amount of $68,000,000; in 1870, $55,000,000, and in 1872, $44,000,000, holding out before the country that their tariff taxation was reduced to that extent, when the last report of the Secretary shows that the whole customs duties in 1866 were $176,000,000; in 1867, $164,000,000; in 1868, $180,000,000; in 1869, $194,000,000; in 1870, $206,000,000, and in 1872, $216,000,000, a steady increase of collection from the people of over $10,000,000 a year during all this time of pretended reduction.

How is that? The people were paying only $176,000,000 of customs before you made any of these reductions; yet the amount collected went up $10,000,000 a year, and took that much more from the people's pockets—at least we got that much more into the Treasury by the repeal of those laws. Why did not the gentleman from Ohio state these facts? The impression made by his speech is that there was that much less money taken from the people, when the finance report shows that year by year you have taken, upon an average, $10,000,000 more.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one question only?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will ask the gentleman if customs duties had not been actually repealed to the amount which the gentleman from Ohio states? And if the receipts from customs have increased, does it not show a more honest collection during the last four years than in 1866?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; I will tell you what it shows. It shows just what we have always contended, that if you will reduce your duties you will get more revenue, because more goods will be imported. The protection to Connecticut and the States of the eastern sea-board has not been quite as great as it was, and the Treasury has succeeded in getting a little more. That far you are entitled to some credit.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me a moment. Does the gentleman mean to imply, by anything he has said, that it is not true by the books, that while the people were paying in 1866 of internal-revenue taxes into the Treasury $309,226,813.42, or in round millions $309,000,000, of internal-revenue taxes into the Treasury, in the year which closed last June they paid only $113,500,000, being a difference of nearly $200,000,000 of tax burdens decreased since 1866? Does the gentleman mean to deny that?

Mr. BECK. Ah; the gentleman, knowing that he had deceived the House and the country as to customs duties, now turns upon internal-revenue taxes. I admit the internal-revenue tax has been diminished.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman what he has to say about deceiving the House by his statement?

Mr. BECK. The statement the gentleman made is as follows:

By the act of July 13, 1866, customs duties were repealed to the amount of		$65,000,000
By the act of March 2, 1867, customs duties were further reduced by the sum of		40,000,000
By the acts of February, March, and July, 1868, customs duties were further reduced by the sum of		68,000,000
By the act of July 14, 1870, the reduction was:
On customs	$55,000,000
On internal revenue	29,526,410
		84,526,410
By the acts of May 1, and June 6, 1872, the reduction, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, was, for eleven months last year:
On customs	$44,365,364
On internal revenue	17,695,456
		62,060,820
Making a total reduction, since the close of the fiscal year 1866, of		319,527,230

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose my gallant friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] knows too well what types do for a man. If they made me say that all that decrease was in the customs, that was so absurd that a boy of six would know it.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman is too fast. The types did not do him injustice. He stated that they repealed the different amounts of customs for the years I have mentioned, and then he gives the amount of reductions of internal-revenue taxes side by side with it. Now he seeks to avoid the force of what I said by saying that the people were benefited by the internal-revenue reduction. I assert that, as to all these items of customs duties, the customs receipts went up $10,000,000 a year in spite of all the pretended reduction, while he was trying to make the country believe that we were relieving the people of that much taxation. I know the internal revenue has been diminished in that time; nobody denies that. The issue cannot be changed by trying to shift one set of figures for another. No, gentlemen, the whole fact is this: There stand your figures, undeniable, that your collections have run up in seven years to $2,748,000,000, and your expenditures have been $2,227,000,000, as the official reports show, independent of your post-office collections from the people and all your outside matters, which have amounted to hundreds of millions more. And they show this, further, that without paying any of the sinking fund, and without any of the payment of the principal of the public debt, notwithstanding all your contrasts of figures, your own official tables show that since March, 1869, when General Grant came into power, the ordinary expenditures of this Government, including only the interest on the public debt, have been $1,600,000,000, or $30,000,000 more than all the ordinary expenditures of the Government of the United States from 1790 to 1861, inclusive, embracing the war of 1812-'15, the Mexican war, all the Indian wars, and all pensions, combined. I have given the figures proving these facts, so that gentlemen can add them up for themselves. I hope, after this exhibit, we will hear no more talk about economy.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I think a still more startling statement is, that the actual pay of members of Congress now during a single year is greater than the total expenditures of the Government in the first year of its existence.

Mr. BECK. Yes; and the actual stealings during this Administration have been quite as much as was necessary to support the administrations of Washington, Adams, and Jefferson for the twenty years they were at the head of the Government. Since General Grant came into power $495,000 have been paid to three men at the port of New York. Here are the official figures, given by the Secretary of the Treasury. Your collector, naval officer, and surveyor of the port have received nearly $500,000 since General Grant came into power, although during that time each one was drawing a salary higher than that paid to a Senator in the Senate of the United States. You pay seventy-four Senators at $5,000 a year, or $370,000, that being the total pay of all the Senators of the United States. Yet these three officials in the city of New York, whose business it is to run primary elections, to pack conventions, to have ballot-boxes stuffed, and to do the dirty work of the Administration, have drawn more since this Administration came into power than would pay the salaries of all the Senators of the United States for a year and a half. You may put that into your pipe, and smoke it, too. [Laughter.] While spies and informers get as much more as an inducement to perform like services.

Sir, it is so at Boston; it is so at Philadelphia; it is so at all the large ports of the country. But I do not intend to go into a further discussion of that matter at present. We shall develop before long such frauds, such corruptions, such peculations, under the auspices of the Government against the great leading merchants of the country as will make the honest men of the republican party stand aghast.

I wish to discuss further the question of the $44,000,000, from which I have wandered away by answering questions.

Simultaneously with the presentation of the bill now under consideration, there was introduced, by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill to legalize the $44,000,000 of legal-tender; he then announced that I was the author of it, and added that, while he would favor it as part of a general system, he would not feel disposed to do so as a separate, isolated proposition. I differed with him, and took occasion to say then, in the few minutes allowed me, what I repeat now, that those who agree with me that the currency ought to be fixed, and not contracted or inflated at the caprice of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the extent of $44,000,000, ought to pass upon this proposition by itself, disconnected from all mere questions of national, free, or State systems of banking. Gentlemen who desire to fix the volume of the currency at $356,000,000 ought to be as anxious as those of us who desire to make it $400,000,000 to deprive the Secretary of all control over it. Those only who desire to continue the present exercise of the Secretary's assumed authority, with all the evils attending contraction to-day and expansion to-morrow, can afford to load it down with amendments in the hope that it may fail between the two Houses of Congress.

Practical statesmanship looks to results. The Senate has been amusing itself and tantalizing the country for nearly two months by discussing financial conundrums, while all business is deranged, all values unsettled, and all confidence destroyed, because the country has become convinced that Congress will not even determine what the volume of the currency is, but, by disagreement between the two Houses, will leave all their interests at the mercy of the Secretary of the Treasury, who will contract or expand the volume of legal-tender notes as the pressure to do one or the other is brought to bear upon him by those he feels bound to obey.

I hope the House will look at this matter as practical men should. Many members would doubtless like to be able to say to their constituents that they voted for expansion, or inflation—call it what you please—to the extent of $100,000,000, or any other amount; others may be equally anxious to assure theirs that they voted and labored to reduce or contract it even below $356,000,000. Each ought to know that their failure to agree only continues upon their people the evils of which all now complain, the absolute subjection of all values to the caprice of the Secretary, or of those who control his action.

Of course it will be the tactics of all who oppose any expansion of currency beyond $356,000,000, and at the same time prefer to allow the Secretary to exercise the power he has usurped to use the $44,000,000 as a "reserve," (that is the name he has selected for it,) to tack all sorts of propositions to the bill. I hope its true friends will vote them all down. Our constituents understand political maneuvers as well as we do when their attention is called to them; and if the bill is defeated by being loaded down with amendments, however plausible or however much to be desired, the men who so defeated it will be held responsible for its defeat. What answer would it be to a sensible and suffering constituency, when you are accounting for the reasons why the Secretary still has them at his mercy, to say that you voted for and carried an amendment through the House making the currency $450,000,000 or $500,000,000, but the Senate would not agree to it, and the bill failed? They would tell you, what you know to be true, that you knew at the time you voted for these amendments that their passage would defeat the bill; and you did not dare to adhere steadily to the only measure of relief you knew could be carried, because you were afraid your constituents had not sense enough to understand the true meaning of your act.

There is not a man on this floor who believes that any bill expanding the legal-tender currency beyond $400,000,000 would receive any consideration in the Senate. Surely that fact would be a good reason to assign to any constituency for refusing to support amendments proposing to inflate it beyond that amount. I confess that I am more afraid of the fears which the friends of this measure have of the intelligence of their own constituents than I am of the power of the contractionists, and therefore I have made these remarks, as I assure the House, in no unkind spirit, but because I earnestly desire to accomplish something practical.

All sorts of attacks have been and will be made against the measure. Some are directed against the expediency, others against the constitutionality of it. As to the the latter, I have only time to say now that, right or wrong, the Supreme Court has settled that, and have said in the Legal-tender cases, in 12 Wallace, page 542, Congress is the only proper body to pass upon this question. I quote only this brief extract:

> Congress had the choice of means for a legitimate end, each appropriate and adapted to that end, though, perhaps, in different degrees. What then? Can this court say that it ought to have adopted the one rather than the other? Is it our province to decide that the means selected were beyond the constitutional power of Congress because we may think that other means to the same ends would have been more appropriate and equally efficient? That would be to assume legislative power, and to disregard the accepted rules for construing the Constitution. The degree of the necessity for any congressional enactment, or the relative degree of its appropriateness, is for consideration in Congress, not here.
> Said Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch vs. Maryland, as already stated: "When the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground." * * * * *
> Making the notes legal tender gave them a new use, and it needs no argument to show that the value of things is in proportion to the uses to which they may be applied.

I have seen all sorts of schemes introduced to defeat this measure. One was presented by a gentleman from New York the other day, the substance of which was to declare the issue of greenbacks, over $356,000,000, illegal, but to provide at the same time that the national banks should take them in, that they should be "redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, or at the pleasure of the holders they may be converted into United States bonds, known as 5 per cents." That is a nice proposition—to convert these notes into 5 per cent. bonds, principal and interest payable in gold, free from all State and Federal taxation—worth 10 per cent. more than the ordinary legal-tenders of the country. The national banks are to gather up the notes issued in excess of $356,000,000, and then convert them into 5 per cent. gold bonds, worth a premium of 10 per cent., the holder thus receiving upon an illegal note 10 per cent. more than the man can get who holds a legal one. These notes of course would be absorbed by the national banks. That may do for a bondholder, but it will not do for the farmers of the West..

I saw a petition presented here the other day, in which a statement was made that the petitioners represented $370,000,000 of capital. Sir, the men of the region where I live represent 370,000,000 acres of land. Contraction of your currency will diminish its value, and the value of all its products, from 10 to 20 per cent., and in their name I protest against any contraction now.

I read a very remarkable speech the other day; I will not say where it was delivered; but I have here an extract from it. I have had it written out, to avoid an objection from anybody that the speech was delivered in the Senate of the United States or made by an ex-Secretary of the Treasury. You can guess whether it was or not. The extract is as follows:

> And now that I have touched upon the moral aspect of this question, perhaps I had better not depart from it, lest I may never return to it. There is, in all these propositions, a moral question which we are bound to consider. If by forced contraction, by legislative power directly applied, you contract the volume of currency in this country below $356,000,000, you have required the debtor to pay something more to the creditor when he pays his debt than he would have paid if you had left the volume of currency untouched. But there is not in this aspect of the case a moral consideration of the importance that attaches to the converse of this policy, the policy of inflation. I ask what excuse, except the sternest necessity, can be offered to the country upon the moral question if you add to the volume of currency and enable debtors to pay their debts with less value than would have been required under the currency that existed when the debts were contracted? In the war we had an excuse; it was a valid excuse. The country was in peril; every interest was in jeopardy. Individual rights under such circumstances are comparatively unimportant. Necessity, stern necessity, is the excuse; it is the defense. But in time of peace, when the country, notwithstanding the present disaster, is prosperous, when its resources are great, when its future is bright, I ask what excuse have we to offer to ourselves or to the country if we add to the volume of the currency, and change the relations of debtor and creditor to the damage of the creditor?
> There is, however, a large agricultural population in this country who owe much and have nothing due to them; they constitute a debtor class. There is also a considerable number of persons in this country who have much owing to them and who never owe anything; they are a creditor class.
> But how will it be now if we inflate the currency for the purpose of furnishing means for carrying on the Government? We change all the relations of debtor and creditor without a sufficient reason: and we leave them to bear a burden which, if it is to be imposed, if it is to be borne by any, should be borne by the country itself. The expenses of maintaining the Government should be borne by the country, and, as I shall have occasion to say before I close my remarks, they can be fairly borne only through the purpose, the resolution, the act of Congress to furnish the means by taxation for carrying on the Government. Every scheme which adds to the volume of currency has in it the element of immorality and the quality of injustice.

Think of the "injustice" of crippling the creditor class! There is no such moral delinquency in injuring the debtor class of the country. "The great mass of the agriculturists," says the distinguished ex-Secretary, "are the debtor class." "There are some who owe nothing; they are the creditor class; legislate for them; it is a moral wrong if you do otherwise." That was the spirit and meaning of your most unjust and iniquitous law of 1869, to strengthen what was called the public credit, which the then Secretary carried out with great promptness, and by which bonds which were payable according to their face in greenbacks were paid in gold; thus taking $40,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States to be put into the pockets of the bondholders, in plain violation of law. It is the representatives of those same bondholders who are now clamoring against any expansion of the currency of the country, in order that they may pocket what yet remains in the hands of the poor and disorganized masses. I have no sympathy with, and no toleration for, such legislation. The greatest good to the greatest number, the protection of the weak, the humble, and the unprotected, ought to be the end and aim of all true men.

Sir, my own State of Kentucky furnishes as good an illustration as any other of the necessity of keeping the currency up to at least $400,000,000, and of having a fair distribution of the banking capital according to law, if the banking system must be kept up.

If gentlemen will turn to the last report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, page 145, they will see that for the eight years from 1866 to 1873, inclusive, Kentucky paid into the Treasury of the United States, as internal taxes upon her industry, $50,729,801.50, or an average of $6,341,225.20 a year. If they will turn to the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, page 7, they will find that while we in Kentucky, with a population about equal to Massachusetts, are allowed only $7,637,900 of currency, Massachusetts is furnished with $59,523,671, while we, owing to our distance from the sea-board, need twice as much as Massachusetts does.

We paid into the Treasury last year $1,695,623.52 for taxation more than Massachusetts, while she has $51,785,771 more banking capital than we are allowed.

By turning to page 11 of the Comptroller's report, it will be seen that in 1862 our bank circulation was $9,035,724, or $7.82 per capita. It is now, in 1873, reduced down to $7,637,000, or $5.78 per capita. Then over three hundred and twenty-five thousand of our population were slaves who used no capital; now all are free and all need it.

It cannot be said of my State, whatever may be said of others, that we do not need it or are too poor to take it. Our last auditor's report shows that our product of tobacco alone was 158,184,929 pounds, worth over $12,500,000, of which at least 130,000,000 pounds were exported. Our hemp products in bagging and rope were worth at least $5,000,000, while our hog, horse, mule, cattle, and other live-stock crops which supply many of the Southern States, are simply enormous, to say nothing of our cereals or manufactures.

It is no exaggeration to say that my own congressional district, (which is perhaps the finest agricultural region in the world,) has more capacity for production of all that is necessary to support human life or promote human comfort than the whole State of Massachusetts, and I do not mean to disparage that great State or her people, but I mean to assert that a grievous wrong has been done to my State by the unequal and unjust discrimination which has been had and maintained to the prejudice of the people I have the honor in part to represent. We cannot afford to contract the currency in the present condition of things. We want reasonable expansion. We need it. We want equal distribution of the currency. We are by law entitled to it.

It may be instructive to look at the history of the currency of the country for the last eight years and see what it shows. Without knowledge upon that subject, and of our wants now, as compared with former years, we will be groping in the dark. For that purpose official facts and figures furnish the best illustration.

I have seen nothing which groups together all the elements necessary to be considered so well as the following article from the Philadelphia North American of January 21, 1874. Of course I cannot vouch for the entire accuracy of all its statements, but I have no doubt it is a close approximation to the truth; it certainly illustrates the condition of the resources, business, and currency of the country in a condensed and intelligible form:

Direct reduction of circulation since July, 1868, above $300,000,000.

In the annual Finance Report of 1872, at page 291, the United States Treasurer gives a tabular statement of the currency outstanding at the close of each fiscal year for the last eleven years. By currency outstanding in these statements are intended the issues of the United States Treasury. The items embraced are, old demand notes, legal-tenders, compound-interest notes, one and two year notes, and fractional currency. For the total currency in actual circulation, or otherwise serving indirectly to the same effect in the money market, we take the statements of the United States Treasurer at the dates which we select, and add thereto the amount of seven-thirty notes, 3 per cent. certificates, and State-bank notes outstanding, thus:

Treasury currency, 30th June, 1865, according to Treasurer's report	$698,918,800
Add seven-thirty notes, 31st July, 1865	830,000,000
National-bank notes, 3d July, 1865	131,452,158
State-bank notes, July, 1865, say	240,000,000
Total circulation in July, 1865	1,900,370,958

This, however, was the state of the circulation immediately upon the close of the war. Let us now look at the currency account after it was fairly reduced to a peace footing:

Treasury currency, according to Treasurer Spinner, June 30, 1868	$444,196,262
Add seven-thirty notes, (January 1, 1868)	240,591,300
Three per cent. certificates, June 30, 1868	50,000,900
National-bank notes, July 6, 1868	294,908,264
State-bank notes, July 6, 1868, say	4,000,000
Total circulation in July, 1868	1,033,395,826
Treasury currency, according to Treasurer Spinner, June 30, 1873	401,527,267
Seven-thirty notes	274,100
Three per cent. certificates, June 30, 1873	30,000
National-bank notes, June 30, 1873	344,858,627
State-bank notes, June 30, 1873	nil.
Total circulation in July, 1873	746,689,994
Treasury currency, 30th September, 1873	402,923,039
Seven-thirty notes, 30th September, 1873	260,500
National-bank notes	348,007,958
Total currency, 30th September, 1873	751,191,497

By this statement—which is official as to all the items except the State-bank notes, which we have taken pains to estimate as accurately as may be—the reduction of the paper currency issues of the Treasury and the National Currency Bureau from the 1st of July, 1868, to the 1st of July, 1873, five years, amounts to $296,705,832.

To this sum should be added the increased amount required to be held as reserve by the national banks, which, from the 1st of July, 1868, to the 13th of June, 1873, amounted to $14,727,894. The amount, therefore, withdrawn from actual circulation in the period is $301,433,726. We add the increase of the bank reserves, because the entire issue of legal-tenders, and of other reserve funds, is charged to the outstanding circulation at each of the dates given in our statements.

Comparative reduction of circulation since July, 1868.

Let us try the items under this head. Of course, only approximate estimates can be made; but, with any margin for differences, the very lowest will answer the purpose of this inquiry.

First. Increase of population in the five intervening years. Taking the rate of increase per annum in the decade of 1860-'70 for the measure of increase from 1868 to 1873, it would stand thus: Population in 1868, 37,260,335; in 1873, 41,358,971, increase, 4,198,636, which is 11 per cent. Most probably the increase was quite 12 per cent., or 4,471,240.

Secondly. Increase of merchandise imported and retained for consumption:

Fiscal year, 1867-'68, gold value	$344,773,435
Premium on gold, 37½ per cent	129,290,037
Currency value	474,063,472
Fiscal year 1872-'73, gold value	624,584,056
Premium on gold, 12 per cent	74,950,086
Currency value	699,534,142
Five years' increase of imports for consumption, equal to 47.5 per cent.	225,470,670

Thirdly. Marketable domestic industrial products:

Year 1868, total value	4,036,030,974
Year 1873, total value	5,821,409,636
Increase in five years, 44.2 per cent	1,785,378,662

Fourthly. Cost of travel and transportation by railroads:

For the calendar year, 1867	332,000,000
Year ending middle of 1873	486,000,000
Increase in five and a half years, 46.5 per cent	154,000,000

Fifthly. Cost of construction of railroads:*

Year 1867, 2,449 miles, at $55,116 per mile	134,979,084
Year 1872, 6,427 miles, at $55,116 per mile	354,230,532
Increase in five years, 162.4 per cent	219,251,448

Sixthly. Increase of wealth of the United States:

In the five years—1868 to 1873—45.25 per cent	11,715,616,652

Seventhly. Increased demand for circulation in payment of wages in the South:

Four millions of slaves were emancipated in the period of five years, and if the wages exceed the former cost of keep $25 a year, we have an increased demand for money at 100 per cent., or	100,000,000

Referring the mere estimates here given to the judgment of experts, we will now summarize the particulars, reminding the student of the subject, however, that no estimates of the increased cost of canal, river, or coastwise travel, transportation and equipment, or of telegraphic construction, and expenses of use is here attempted.

Summary of the items selected.

Items.	Amount.	Per cent.
Increase of foreign imports for consumption	$225,470,670	47.5
Increase of marketable industrial products	1,785,378,662	44.2
Increase of cost of travel and transportation by railroads	154,000,000	46.5
Increase of cost of construction of railroads	219,251,448	162
Increase of wealth of the United States†	11,715,616,652	45.25
Increase of wages demanded in the South	100,000,000	100
Aggregate increase in amount of items enumerated	14,199,717,432	45.8

After deduction of discount upon the currency in 1870, the average annual rate of increase would be 7¾ per cent., compounded. This rate gives us $25,777,600,000 for the wealth of the United States in 1868, and $37,442,000,000 for the wealth in 1873. Increase in five years, 45¼ per cent.

No man can look at these facts and figures without feeling that it would be doing injustice to all the interests of the country to refuse to legalize the $44,000,000, and make the legal-tender currency at least $400,000,000. Contraction below that point is equivalent to adding from 10 to 20 per cent. to every debt which the debtor class of the country owe to their creditors. Sir, if $1,000,000,000 of paper money were in circulation in one form or other in 1868, and it has been reduced anywhere in the neighborhood of $300,000,000 since that time, while the population has increased so vastly, and when all the business of the country, and its prosperity as well, have increased 45 per cent., how can men who engaged in business, or contracted debts, when that amount of currency regulated values, either discharge their obligations or realize anything from their legitimate investments if the legal-tender notes of the country are to be still further reduced?

*In the 5½ years from 1867 to the middle of 1873, 31,041 miles of railroad were constructed at a cost of $1,710,855,756. During the 5½ years preceding 1868, the cost of construction was $418,220,208. Increase in the latter period over the former, $1,292,635,448—309 per cent.

† The wealth of the United States in 1860, valuation of slaves deducted, we put at $14,183,215,628. Census valuation in 1870, $30,068,518,507.

Somehow or other I have never been able to appreciate the merit of the cry which has become so loud and incessant of late among the bondholders and their advoctes here and elsewhere, of the evils of an irredeemable paper currency, or of their denunciation of what they choose to call the worthless greenbacks; a currency which, even at $400,000,000, can all be absorbed in two years. If the friends of the bondholders and the other protected monopolists would only unite with those of us who believe in them in passing a law authorizing the Government to receive its own notes in payment of the customs duties it exacts from the people, they need neither be worthless nor irredeemable. The amount collected in gold from the people for tariff taxes alone in the last two years was $404,000,000. The people would gladly have paid it in legal-tender notes and saved the 15 per cent. premium which went into the pockets of the bondholders and those protected by the tariff.

These gentlemen, with all their pretenses, do not want the legal-tenders redeemed. They want the Government to continue to repudiate them. So long as they continue to pursue that policy it does not lie in their mouths to be crying out against the currency as being irredeemable.

Sir, all the legal-tenders we ask to keep in circulation would not pay to the Government the average annual taxes imposed upon the people. From 1867 to 1873, a period of six years, the tax-payers of this country paid into the Treasury, as the last Finance Report shows, $2,768,882,844.43—two-thirds of it in gold—an average of $461,480,474.07 a year, being $61,480,474.07 annually more than the $400,000,000 we ask you to legalize. And yet it is called worthless and irredeemable. The Government can absorb it all in less than a year, whenever a better substitute can be furnished. All those who are raising this false clamor about irredeemable currency know these facts full well.

Sir, without paper money none of the great results achieved could have been accomplished. The enormous taxation we have sustained could not have been borne; our railroads could not have been built, nor the waste places of the war restored. All this has been done, too, under a nefarious banking system, which has enriched a few monopolists at the expense of the masses. Twenty million dollars a year is thus lavished on pets and favorites. I would abolish it at once. I would make banking free, and I would give the Government the benefit of its own credit, instead of enriching private individuals by it at the expense of the public. But my time is too nearly exhausted to take up that subject now. I see I have but seven or eight minutes left. One word upon another subject.

These results appear the more marvelous when it is remembered that they have been accomplished in spite of the most nefarious system of tariff taxation ever invented by human ingenuity—a system to which the American people never would have submitted but for the fact that it was fastened upon them during the years of war, when laws were silent, when protests against oppressions were unheeded, and when the men who had seized the reins of Government were secretly, under the guise of patriotism, building up colossal fortunes for themselves by legislation which they knew was destructive of all the best interests of the Republic. These laws they still perpetuate, in spite of all the efforts of the representatives of a disorganized people. Combined wealth and its representatives in Congress, in the form of tariff protectionists, bondholders, national bankers, and other corporate monopolies, rule and control us in all things.

I wish some power existed to develop the number of Representatives and Senators who are personally interested in class legislation. It would be an interesting exhibit, and one which I think the country ought to have. I have no doubt a majority in the Senate, and a large minority in the House, are personally interested in the passage of laws inimical to the interests of the masses. But I have no time to go into that now, and no time to develop the iniquitous workings of the tariff, as a whole. I must illustrate by an isolated proposition, which will make the other kindred branches and their operations and effects easily comprehended.

Take our shipping interest under the present tariff, and compare it with what it was under the democratic revenue tariff of 1860. That is a fair example, not governed or controlled by local influences, and is an interest whose prosperity or decline reaches to the very vitals of the prosperity of the country.

Up to 1860 we had been pushing to the front of the commercial nations of the world under the influence of a low revenue tariff with a steadiness and rapidity that were the just pride and boast of every American. Our sails whitened every sea, our flag floated triumphantly in every foreign port; in a few years we had built up a commercial marine almost equal to that of Great Britain, and surpassed that of all the other nations of the earth combined; we were developing a class of sailors before whose skill, prowess, and energy even the tars of England quailed. All nations were paying us tribute, and while doing so they saw that we were only in our infancy, with empires even then untouched in the great West, whose products would in the early future make our present greatness sink into insignificance, and they felt that they were pygmies in a contest with a giant. The broom of old Van Tromp was in our grasp. We had almost snatched England's national anthem from her. Our sailors could sing from their mast-heads—

> Columbia needs no bulwarks, no towers along the steep;
> Her march is o'er the mountain wave, her home is on the deep.

When in an evil hour we reversed our action, piled burdens mountain-high on all that made or maintained ships and commerce, and by the folly, the individual greed, the imbecility, to use no harsher term, of the republican leaders and rulers, we fell from our high estate, and are now suppliants and beggars where twelve years ago we were lords and masters. A few manufacturers in New England and Pennsylvania have been enriched; a suffering and a plundered country has been brought to the verge of bankruptcy to enrich them. I propose to make good by official facts and figures all, and far more than all, that I have said.

In 1860, our total trade with foreign nations amounted in value to $762,288,550; of which American vessels carried $507,247,757, and foreign vessels carried $255,047,793. The excess of freight in favor of the United States was then $252,206,964, and the excess of receipts or profits in the trade was $20,176,557.

In his last annual message to Congress, on the 1st day of December, 1873, the President of the United States said:

> We pay $80,000,000 per annum for the transportation of our surplus products to a market, thus increasing the balance of trade against us to that amount.

Think of it; over $20,000,000 paid to us in 1860 for the same service for which we now pay foreign nations $80,000,000 a year—a difference of $100,000,000 against us—a sum sufficient to pay all the expenses of the Government during the twenty years of the administrations of George Washington, John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson.

This vast sum is not only gone from our own people forever, but it is permanently transferred to the pockets of our antagonists in the contest for commercial supremacy—to our enemies when strife arises. It requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell the result of such a state of things. Official figures tell the melancholy tale. They were all arrayed in a masterly manner by Senator CRAGIN, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, at the last session of the last Congress; and being thus doubly official, their correctness is undoubted. He showed that up to 1850 we had accumulated a tonnage of 3,772,439 tons. In 1860 we had increased our shipping 5,539,813 tons, or nearly 47 per cent. in ten years of low tariff and democratic rule. We had built for foreign nations during that time 349,915 tons, for which our builders and mechanics had been paid $20,994,940 by them. During that ten years of commercial prosperity our mechanical industries engaged in ship-building had realized $212,162,885, or $21,212,628 a year.

Great Britain had in 1860-'61 a tonnage of 5,895,369, or only 355,556 tons more than we had, though she had been contending for supremacy on the sea for hundreds of years. We, her recently emancipated Colonies, were sweeping past her with a giant's stride. At that time the tonnage of all the other nations of the earth combined was less than ours. I know the response which rises in the mind of every supporter of the Administration and its protective-tariff policy is that the war drove our commerce from the sea, destroyed our ships, crippled our ship-builders; in short, is reponsible for all that has followed. I say with emphasis, that is not true, except to a very limited extent, as I will proceed to prove.

Senator CRAGIN says:

> Our former average of 71 per cent. in the total of both direct and indirect carrying trade of 1860 is now reduced to 15 per cent. To what is this ruinous decline in the carrying trade upon the ocean—which in 1860-'61 was the most prosperous in the world's history—to be charged? Is it the result of the four years' war from 1861 to 1865? Let us see. When the first battle of that war was fought, in 1861—
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | In the month of July the registered and enrolled tonnage of the United States was | 5,539,813 |
> | In July, 1865, when the war was ended, the registered and enrolled tonnage was | 5,096,781 |
> | Showing a decrease of only | 443,032 |

Sir, in the face of these facts, I deny that the war had anything appreciable to do with the present prostrate condition of our commerce.

All our reports, all our statisticians, agree that by the war the country lost $9,000,000,000 of property and values. Hon. David A. Wells, in his invaluable reports, which you have all doubtless read, proves that to be true beyond all peradventure; yet in the midst of that terrible wreck we had only lost 443,000 of our tonnage; we had still over 5,000,000 of tonnage afloat and ready for service in July, 1865. What other industry lost so little?

When, in 1865, a prostrate and war-stricken country reunited and sprang upon its feet; when swords were turned into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks, and all the great energies of a mighty people were devoted to the building up of their waste places and the restoration of their desolated homes, ships with a tonnage of over five millions lay ready, in the ports of the country, to bear the products of the labor of the people to all parts of the earth, and to bring back in exchange the necessaries and the luxuries which soil, climate, and the habits or necessities of other regions enabled them to produce for us more cheaply than we could.

When the country demanded the services of our ships and our sailors, it was found that they were driven from the seas by our infernal system of tariff taxation. Our ships had to be sold for what they would bring, and our sailors had to go into the coal mines or the iron founderies, whose owners were enabled to employ them by the bounties coerced out of the consumers of the country by congressional enactments.

Again I quote from Senator CRAGIN. He said:

In the international commerce of the world since 1860, while other nations have been rapidly advancing we have stood still, as will be seen by the following table, which includes the total value in gold of the imports and exports (excluding bullion) of the countries named.

International or world's commerce for 1860:

The United States	$763,000,000
The United Kingdom	1,666,728,514
France	892,500,000
Germany	537,400,500
Holland	314,883,045
Belgium	131,798,600
Denmark, Sweden and Norway	122,906,156
Russia	267,379,225
Austria	202,284,870
Italy	250,000,000
European Turkey	132,318,686
Greece	12,913,474
Spain and Portugal	179,189,950
Switzerland	118,903,410
North and South America, exclusive of United States	350,333,665
Total world's commerce	5,992,542,099

Proportion of the United States in this, 13 per cent.

International or world's commerce for 1870:

United States, $991,896,839 currency, in gold	$886,270,503
United Kingdom	3,180,238,750
France	1,506,000,000
Germany	822,578,970
Holland	404,611,742
Belgium	465,000,000
Denmark, Sweden and Norway	161,256,220
Russia	384,202,880
Austria	402,500,000
Italy	350,091,245
European Turkey	192,500,000
Greece	92,500,000
Spain and Portugal	184,771,270
Switzerland	128,000,000
North and South America, exclusive of United States	661,323,845
Total world's commerce	9,567,074,160

Proportion of the United States in this commerce of the world 9.26 per cent., or a falling off of one-fourth since 1860.

While we have in these twelve years thus fallen off, England has doubled her commerce, France has increased one-half, Germany one-half, Austria has doubled, Italy increased one-half, and all the rest increased to a more or less extent. The whole international commerce of the world has increased more than 50 per cent. in the last decade, while that of the United States has stood nearly still, notwithstanding that she has a larger basis for her commerce than any other nation in the world.

Had her commerce advanced with a progress equal to that of Great Britain, it would have developed in its progression an amount, during that time, equal in the aggregate to $4,578,000,000, in addition to and beyond what it has aggregated in that period.

As we had advanced more rapidly than Great Britain, it is evident we could have kept progress with her. Hence the estimate of gain is reasonable, especially as during that period our population had increased 25 per cent., and our industrial resources 50 per cent.

He said further:

Taking the whole carrying trade as between Europe and the United States, it has been shown that before the war we held a yearly average of 71 per cent. of its amount. The preceding statistics show that we now average only 15 per cent. of it. Had we placed iron steamers on the ocean capable of sustaining equality in transportation, our proportion, without any increase, would have continued 71 per cent., as previously held, less the 15 per cent. we now hold, which would give us yearly as our part of the freight receipts, $37,843,157, which in the twelve years from 1860 to this time would have amounted to the sum of $454,118,244

There have been brought to our shores, from 1861 to the present time, 2,916,629 immigrants in foreign ships, which at the average of thirty-five dollars for each immigrant is	$102,081,870
There have been carried from our ports to Europe in the same period 357,712 steerage passengers, which at the average of thirty dollars each is	11,731,360
The estimated yearly average of first-class passengers on outward and inward passages is 86,829; this for the same term gives 1,041,948, which, at $110 each—a low average—is	114,614,286
Making an aggregate of	228,467,516
Seventy-one per cent. of this amount, had we retained our ships on the ocean, would have been our proportion, and is		162,190,636
In the six years preceding 1860 we had built ships upon foreign orders which averaged per year $2,602,170, and at this average, without increase, is for the twelve years		33,626,040
There is thus a loss of		649,934,920

on these three items of ocean commerce.

These are melancholy truths; but they are true as holy writ, not the result of war, but the result of unwise, unjust, I ought to say, infamous legislation here. I read not long ago that at a dinner, given recently by the Cobden Club in London, Mr. Potter, a member of Parliament, said, in the hearing of David A. Wells, who had made them a great speech, that when the Shah of Persia visited London and went through her magnificent docks, there was not a single United States flag in all that grand array of the ships of the nations, and Mr. Wells had to rise and say, "Mr. Potter, I beg your pardon; there was one." Twelve years before her docks were full of our merchant vessels, and they were sought for by her people in preference to their own; now all the great steamship lines sailing from our ports sail under foreign flags, and our own ships can only hover along our coasts where by law we have prohibited the ships of other nations from coming.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is out; I only want to add that the President of the United States had a lucid interval about the time the war broke out between France and Germany, when he recommended to us free ships; he took it all back, unfortunately. Congress, I hope, will take it up some day.

Without further detaining the House, I will add his message on that subject to my speech, as Judge KELLEY must have the floor.

The following is the message referred to:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

* * * * * * *

The latest intelligence from Europe indicates the imminence of a war between France and North Germany. In view of this a sound policy indicates the importance of some legislation tending to enlarge the commercial marine of this country.

The vessels of this country at the present time are insufficient to meet the demand which the existence of a war in Europe will impose upon the commerce of the United States, and I submit to the consideration of Congress that the interests of the country will be advanced by the opportunity to our citizens to purchase vessels of foreign construction for the foreign trade of the country. An act to this effect may be limited in its duration to meet the immediate exigency.

The foreign mail service of the United States is, in a large degree, depending upon the Bremen and Hamburg lines of steamers. The Post-Office Department has entered into contracts in writing with the two companies above named, and with the Williams & Guion lines respectively, for a regular and continuous service of two years. The only arrangement that could be made with the Inman and Cunard lines is temporary, and may be broken off at any time. The North German lines are first class in point of speed and equipment, their steamers usually making the trip across the Atlantic in from twenty-four to thirty-six hours in advance of the Williams & Guion line.

Should the North German steamers be blockaded or impeded by France, our postal intercourse with foreign nations will be greatly embarrassed, unless Congress shall interpose for its relief.

I suggest to Congress the propriety of further postponing the time for adjournment, with the view of considering the questions herein communicated.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 15, 1870.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want one minute only. I did not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but he has charged the Secretary of the Treasury with extravagance, and with surrounding himself with chiefs of divisions and bureaus. I wish, in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury, to state that in 1869, at the close of the Johnson administration, there were twenty-three of these bureaus and divisions in the Treasury Department, and under the present administration the number has been reduced to twelve.

The following is a list of the divisions or bureaus which existed at the close of the Johnson administration: Appointment, Civil Warrants, War and Navy Warrants, Public Debt Statement and Finances, Sub-Treasury, Revenue Marine, Internal Revenue, Stationery, Printing, Libraries, Special Agents, Steamboat Inspection, Files and Binding, Note, Loan, Miscellaneous, and seven Customs Divisions, as follows: Warehouse, Fines and Forfeitures, Rates of Duties, Navigation, and three Law Branches.

Under the reorganization of 1869 these were consolidated, and now exist as follows: Appointment, Warrant, Independent Treasury, Customs, Revenue Marine, Internal Revenue, Navigation, Record and Files, Stationery and Printing, Mail, Note, Loans.

Mr. BECK. And the republican majority was larger and more overbearing during Johnson's administration than it is now.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no doubt in the world that Great Britain agreed, by the convention of Geneva, to pay $15,500,000 to our Government, because our own protective tariffs had swept our commerce from the seas. Now, of course I know that was the basis of the Government, and therefore I cordially approve the assertion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] on the subject of the destruction of our commercial marine.

THE WAY TO RESTORE THE REVENUES.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the repeal at this time of any portion of the stamp tax, as proposed by the bill under consideration, would be most injudicious. This part of our revenue is easily and faithfully collected, and, in my judgment, costs us a smaller percentage than any other equal amount derived from internal taxes. In so far, he and I are in accord; but from the remedies he suggested for the embarrassments of the Treasury I earnestly dissent.

If regarded merely as administrative reforms, several of them are commendable; but, if proposed as means by which the depleted Treasury may be replenished, I cannot regard them as worthy of consideration.

Considered in this light, they remind me of what I have read or dreamed, of a provident and industrious people who, having constructed a reservoir of sufficient capacity to contain water enough for all their wants, conducted to it the natural outflow of thousands of springs, and, as a reward for their enterprise, enjoyed a supply of water adequate to all the demands of comfort, health, and productive industry. But in time it so happened that one after another of the small tributaries to their reservoir was obstructed and forced into divergent channels, and the supply of water began to fail. The case became alarming; the health and prosperity of the people were threatened; the increase of productive industries was checked; the laboring masses were without employment by reason of want of water to move the machinery of the workshop and factory; the credit of the people, individually and as a community, was impaired, and general bankruptcy impended. "How shall the threatened calamity be averted?" was the prevailing question. To answer it and ascertain whether the supply of water on which so much depended had been withdrawn, or merely obstructed, they invoked the aid of an engineer of great eminence. In response to their summons he devoted many days to the investigation of the case. His duty was to discover, if possible, the cause of the deficiency. The people waited anxiously for the announcement of his judgment and were grievously disappointed when they heard it; when, with prodigal amplitude of detail, he proceeded to show that vermin had effected a number of considerable leaks in the embankment of the reservoir, and, with ponderous gravity, suggested as the remedy for all their ills that these leaks should be stopped and the vermin exterminated or driven from the vicinity. The simple-minded people had not been ignorant of the steady waste of a small quantity of water. Indeed, such waste seemed to them to be almost, if not absolutely inevitable, and, though but little skilled in the science of engineering, they at once perceived the inadequacy of the remedy proposed. Experience had taught them that what they needed was the restoration of a living flow of water into the reservoir, and they now addressed themselves to the work of discovering the mouths of the springs that had once fed it, and to the removing of the fallen rocks and general débris that obstructed them. By this simple process they soon accomplished their object and re-established individual and general prosperity.

May we not profit by their example? Our financial reservoir is nearly empty, the machinery of thousands of our shops and factories is motionless, and earnest and wide-spread appeals for charity startle the people of all the great cities of the country, and proclaim the terrible sufferings the unemployed working people are enduring. And our engineer, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, failing to discover any quickening impulse or source of supply, suggests no other remedy than the stopping of a few leaks produced by the vermin who infest every government in seasons of war and national excitement. The people must therefore take affairs into their own hands, and, if possible, restore to activity the suppressed streams by which the Treasury was replenished from the close of 1861 till the Treasury Department and Congress by contracting the currency suppressed and sealed the sources from which our abundant revenues had come.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that my presumption, in assuming to suggest adequate remedies for the evils of the times, merits, and will receive, the sneering condemnation of the book-worms, theorists, and bankers of the House and country. What right have I, who never owned a share of bank stock, and am wholly unfamiliar with the councils of bank parlors, to meddle with questions of revenue and finance, while there sit around me so many gentlemen who are versed in the literature of banking, and have had large experience in the management of institutions whose profits are increased by the adversity of the people, and to whom the inordinate rates of interest consequent upon financial stringency are a godsend?

It was said that much learning had made Paul mad. Sir, I am sure this will not be supposed to be my case, for I am but a plodding interrogator of our own recent financial history and of current events. Strangely enough, sir, this limited field of study has forced upon me the conviction that the most dangerous thing a legislator can possess is knowledge—that absolute knowledge which is derived a priori, which regards the teaching of the passing year as vulgar and impertinent, and the possession of which justifies gentlemen in ignoring any fact that seems to conflict with conclusions imparted by men who were once accepted teachers—such knowledge, sir, as that possessed by the people who persecuted Galileo! They did not believe; they knew that the world was a fixed body around which the sun revolved. Their knowledge was as absolute and as intolerant as that of those among us who know that an increase of circulation in a country sparsely settled and abounding in undeveloped resources, however much it may stimulate production, and supply existing demand, must by an inflexible law, made by Montesquieu or Hume a century ago, increase the price of all commodities. The learned men of his day tortured Galileo into a renunciation of his error, and compelled him to sanction his renunciation by an oath. But it is recorded that as he rose from the desecrated altar, he stamped his foot and exclaimed, "But it does move." Yes, sir, the world does move; and the folly of the alleged algebraic relation between the volume of currency and the prices of commodities which was invented by Montesquieu, anglicised by Hume, and is still accepted as true by our gold-basis sophists, has been demonstrated a thousand times by terrible experience.

I refer to such knowledge, sir, as that enjoyed by the medical profession of Harvey's day. The members of that highly educated fraternity knew that the blood did not circulate in the arteries of man or beast. Though the value of his discovery was promptly recognized by learned bodies outside of his profession, it is said that no physician who was over forty years of age at the time of its promulgation ever accepted it. They had lived long enough to know that Harvey was an imposter, and his pretended discovery a fraud. They knew this, sir, as absolutely as gentlemen around me now know that gold, a commodity the price of which has fluctuated more violently than that of any other, is the only absolute and unvarying standard and measure of values.

The knowledge of which I speak is such as has been imparted by every British political economist from Malthus to John Stuart Mill, namely, that in new countries men have always settled first on the best lands, so that, with increase of population and the occupation of the hill-sides, production must decrease in a given ratio with the increase of population, and that war, pestilence, and famine are the gentle providential influences by which alone society is protected against an inevitable return to cannibalism. They know this absolutely and beyond all peradventure, though the observation of every intelligent observer in this broad land confirms the evidence of universal history that early settlements are made on uplands, and that it is only when population and capital have aggregated, and the rich alluvial lowlands may be made salubrious by drainage and other improvements, involving the expenditure of labor and capital, that the more productive valleys can be safely occupied. They do not merely believe this dogma of Malthus; they know the fact as absolutely as the owners of the banking monopoly of this country know that two inconvertible currencies, by one of which the other is to be redeemed, are less complex than one would be, and that it is more economical for the Government to pay eighteen or twenty million dollars of gold annually to the owners of national banks for keeping in circulation that kind of notes which the others redeem, than it would be to substitute greenbacks for bank-notes, and annually save this large amount of gold.

The knowledge I deprecate is such, sir, as this same class of economists possess and promulgate, when, following McCulloch, they assert that a populous country like England can by no possibility double its wealth in less than sixty years. They know this as absolutely as McCulloch did, though Lowe and Gladstone, instructed by the figures of the census and the returns of the revenue office, have found that sixteen years have sufficed to double the wealth of England. What of such facts as these? Are they not impertinent? Do they not contradict a priori conclusions? Did not McCulloch say that it could not be done under sixty years, and is he not still an authority before whom not only humble people like myself, but Lowe and Gladstone, and the board of trade, and the facts of current history, should all hide their heads in blushing modesty?

Sir, such knowledge is the bane of these times; and so regarding it, I turn from the field of metaphysical speculation to our own recent history, the story of our revenues as they illustrate the sufferings, the prosperity, and the renewed sufferings of our people, to find an adequate remedy for the ills that now beset our country, which ills, as I shall demonstrate to the satisfaction of every unbiased and disinterested man, flow from the contraction of the current money of the realm and the expansion of that system of individual and corporate credit which transfers the profits of the farmer, the manufacturer, the transporter, and even the wages of the laboring masses, to the banker, the dealer in credit, or what Bonamy Price calls the lender of purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of valuable tables appended to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, not the least valuable of which is a statement of the receipts of the Treasury from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1873. The table presents the receipts from all sources. But for the present I shall consider only the receipts from customs, internal revenue, and direct taxes; and, except to state the total amount collected up to June 30, 1873, and compare it with the receipts of special periods, I will confine myself to the consideration of those for the years 1856 to 1873 inclusive.

Let us consider first those for the first six years, namely, from 1856 to 1861 inclusive. The receipts of these years other than from public lands and miscellaneous sources were derived from customs only; those of 1856 and part of 1857 were collected under the so-called revenue tariff of 1846, to which the protective tariff of 1842 gave place.

As the receipts under that act were found to be insufficient for the expenses of the Government, the free-traders then in power, believing that lower rates of duties would increase the revenue, enacted the tariff of 1857, which provided for a general reduction of duties. The diminished receipts for the remaining years of the period to which I invite attention illustrate the folly of the theorists who hope to increase the revenues of the Government by paralyzing the industries of the people. For the six years they were as follows:

1858	41,789,620 96
1859	49,565,824 38
1861	39,582,125 64

During the last two months of the last of these fiscal years we had an army in the field for the suppression of the rebellion. I have selected these years in part, because, with the brief exception alluded to, they mark a period of profound peace, the financial legislation of which furnishes a striking commentary upon the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that—

> Never but once or twice in the history of this Government have we found ourselves, in time of peace, compelled to borrow money to carry on our current expenses.

Sir, our statute-book contains provisions for seven loans during these six years of unbroken peace. The statutes stand there as a commentary upon the absurdity of the American people attempting to develop their country with a currency convertible into specie and under the free-trade policy taught by the manufacturers of Great Britain. The proceeds of six of these loans were applied to the payment of current expenses, and were needed for that purpose only; and the seventh—a comparatively small loan, less than $3,000,000—was contracted to defray the expenses incurred by Oregon and Washington Territories in the suppression of Indian hostilities in 1855 and 1856. In this time of peace we contracted a debt of $90,000,000.

Let me call attention to these several acts, upon the passage of every one of which the gentleman from Massachusetts doubtless voted, for he had at the date of the earliest of them entered upon the career which was to make us bow before his large experience and hail him as the father of the House.

First, we find the act of December 23, 1857, which authorized an issue of twenty millions in Treasury notes, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum, and receivable in payment of all public dues, and to be redeemed after the expiration of one year from the date of said notes.

Secondly. The act of June 14, 1858, authorized a loan of twenty millions, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, and reimbursable, at the option of the Government, at any time after the expiration of fifteen years from January 1, 1859.

Thirdly. The act of June 22, 1860, authorized a loan of twenty millions, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum, and reimbursable within a period not beyond twenty years, and not less than ten years, for the redemption of outstanding Treasury notes, and for no other purposes.

Fourthly. The act of December 16, 1860, authorized an issue of ten millions in Treasury notes, to be redeemed after the expiration of one year from the date of issue, and bearing such a rate of interest as may be offered by the lowest bidder. Authority was given by this act to issue the notes it authorized in payment of warrants in favor of public creditors at their par value, bearing 6 per cent. interest per annum.

Fifthly. The act of February 8, 1861, authorized a loan of twenty-five millions, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum, reimbursable within a period not beyond twenty years nor less than ten years. This loan was made specifically for the payment of the current expenses of the Government, and was to be awarded, without restriction as to terms, to the most favorable bidders.

Sixthly. The act of March 2, 1861, authorized a loan of ten millions, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum, and reimbursable after the expiration of ten years from July 1, 1861. In case proposals for the loan were not acceptable, authority was given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the whole amount in Treasury notes, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum. Authority was also given to substitute Treasury notes for the whole or any part of the loans, for which the Secretary was by law authorized to contract and issue bonds at the time of the passage of the act, such Treasury notes to be receivable in payment of all public dues, and redeemable at any time within two years from March 2, 1861.

Seventhly. The act of March 2, 1861, also authorized the issue, should the Secretary of the Treasury deem it expedient, of $2,800,000 in coupon bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and redeemable in twenty years, for the payment of expenses incurred by the Territories of Washington and Oregon in the suppression of Indian hostilities during the years 1855 and 1856.

Now, sir, let me call your attention to the amount of revenue received by the Treasury for the twelve succeeding years, and show you that, as in the six years I have just alluded to, they sank from $64,000,000 in 1856, to $39,000,000 in 1861, they ascended in the next five years from $50,000,000 in 1862, to $490,000,000 in 1866. I ask gentlemen to note the progress to the grand climax, attained in 1866, of $490,248,219.12, and also to note the further fact that this was the year immediately preceding the commencement of the work of contracting the volume of our currency. After 1861 the revenues of which I speak were derived from customs, internal taxes, and direct taxes, and the amount collected in each year was as follows:

1864	212,532,936 05
1865	295,593,048 88
1866	490,248,219 12
1867	446,645,582 01
1868	357,340,334 82
1869	339,170,573 10
1870	379,667,223 81
1871	349,948,917 05

May I not, in view of these figures, pause and ask whether the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means covered the whole field of possibilities when he suggested that our only resource was an increase of taxation, the making of a loan, or a system of parsimonious retrenchment, which would be alike discreditable to us and damaging to the national credit—a system of retrenchment that would suspend all the public works deliberately provided for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, for the fortification of our coasts, and for the accommodation of the people of the country, in the way of adequate post-offices, court-houses, and other public buildings; a system which, under the name of economy, would still further impair the public revenue, by adding from fifty to one hundred thousand to the vast army of unemployed artisans and laborers of the country, and by contracting the power of the people to consume taxable and dutiable goods.

To enable gentlemen to answer this question, let me ask what power enabled the American people, who could contribute but $49,000,000 to the revenues of the country in 1859, to pay without complaint $490,000,000 in 1866? Was it a special providence, or was it the result of congressional action? In 1859 the entire people of the country, whether they dwelt upon the banks of the Rio Grande or in the upper peninsula of Michigan, were contributors to our revenue. In the meanwhile the people of fifteen of the largest and most fertile States had withheld all contributions from our revenues and paid their taxes into the treasury of the southern confederacy. But notwithstanding this, we had created an army and navy and kept a million of men in the field or afloat; had armed, fed, clothed, transported, and paid our soldiers and sailors with a generosity that no other nation has ever equaled, and had overrun and devastated the southern portion of our country, and reduced its people to a degree of poverty and destitution hitherto unknown to any portion of the people of our country. To the credit of their valor and endurance it may be said that even in 1866, when from sheer exhaustion they had accepted the situation and recognized the stars and stripes as the banner of their country, they were wholly unable to contribute to that country's revenues.

Will gentlemen ascribe the tenfold power of our people to endure taxation to the fact that the southern people no longer shared their burdens. Or will they attribute it to the fact that a million men, mainly made up of the manly youth and youthful manhood of the country, had been withdrawn from productive pursuits to be supported and paid by their brethren while they waged the most destructive warfare of history? Or will they ascribe it to the fact that we were during these years deprived of our great staple exports, cotton and tobacco, and that the exigencies of the war converted much of our commercial marine into transports and armed vessels, and the now acknowledged treachery of England drove the remainder of our merchant ships from the sea?

Sir, I think no one will ascribe the increased wealth and prosperity and power to endure taxation exhibited by the people of the Northern States of the Union to any or to all these influences. No, sir; we must seek the cause of these marvelously beneficent results elsewhere. Happily they are not concealed, and he who will may trace them. They are to be found between the covers of our statute-books. And he who seeks them there will discover that without loan, without increase of taxation, without the parsimonious economy suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, there is another method of replenishing the Treasury, which is as beneficent as it is simple. The thing to be done is to give the people a volume of currency sufficient for the legitimate business of the country, and thus relieve them from the grasp of the banking monopoly and credit-mongers of this and other lands, and enable them to sell their land, their labor, or their commodities for cash, as they did during the war. By this means, and by this means alone, can we replenish the exhausted Treasury and restore the sinking fund.

Money, sir, is the sinews of war. When Sumter was fired on the Government was without recognized resources, and the people were without money. Our currency had been, as the false and delusive phrase goes, on a specie basis; but in 1857 the Bank of England, representing a creditor nation, needed about $7,000,000 of our specie, and with a creditor's power took it without consulting the interest or convenience of the debtor. The loss of this small amount of the basis of our currency occasioned the collapse of our whole financial system. The Ohio Life and Trust Company exploded; the Pennsylvania Bank echoed the explosion, and before the sun set on that day the banking and financial system of the country had collapsed, and the American people had again been taught that the theory of specie basis for the currency of a debtor nation is a falsehood, a delusion, and a snare. Though nearly four years had elapsed since the Old Lady of Threadneedle street had treated us thus ungenerously, the business of our country had not reacted when Sumter was fired on. Almost as great a percentage of our laboring people were living in enforced idleness in the spring of 1861 as are in that deplorable condition now. To attempt to conduct the war by means of a currency based on specie would have been a folly too great for the men who then administered the Government and led the counsels of the two Houses of Congress. They knew that that was money which the Government declared to be legal tender; and they knew, further, that the credit of the United States of America was an adequate basis for all the money that might be needed for the Army, the Navy, and the civil service of the Government. Their wisdom, as shown in the manner in which they decided this question, it was that saved the Government; and the sufferings the people are now enduring are but the painful proofs of the lack of like wisdom on the part of those who have succeeded them.

Is this theory, sir? Let your statute books answer; and I beg gentlemen to compare the dates of the several laws to which I am about to refer with the progress of the taxable power of the people of this country, the proofs of which I have exhibited; for he who will fairly make this comparison shall no longer doubt that an adequate volume of currency and a low rate of interest will enhance beyond the conception of man the productive powers of a free people, dwelling in a territory as broad and as richly endowed with every element of national and individual prosperity as ours.

In response to President Lincoln's proclamation, Congress assembled on the 4th of July, 1861, to make provision for the support of the Army already in the field and to provide for the future exigencies of the war.

The act of July 17, 1861, authorized a loan of $250,000,000, the bonds for which should bear 7 per cent. interest and be redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after twenty years; Treasury notes bearing interest at the rate of 7.30 per cent., payable three years after date; and $50,000,000 of United States notes, without interest, payable on demand, and left the proportion of the bonds and Treasury notes to the discretion of the Secretary.

The act of August 5, 1861, authorized the issue of 6 per cent. bonds, payable at the pleasure of the United States after twenty years, and provided that they might be issued in exchange for the seven-thirty Treasury notes in sums of not less than $500, and that the whole amount of the bonds should not exceed the whole amount of seven-thirties.

The act of February 25, 1862, authorized the issue of $150,000,000 in legal-tender United States notes, $50,000,000 of which were to be in lieu of the demand notes issued under the act of July 17, 1861, and also authorized a temporary loan of $25,000,000 in greenbacks for not less than thirty days, payable after ten days' notice, at 5 per cent. interest per annum.

The act of March 1, 1862, authorized an issue of certificates of indebtedness, bearing 6 per cent., payable one year from date, the interest to be paid in gold, principal in greenbacks.

The act of March 17, 1862, authorized an increase of temporary loans of $25,000,000, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The act of July 11, 1862, authorized an additional issue of $150,000,000 legal-tender notes, $35,000,000 of which might be in denominations less than five dollars; $50,000,000 of the issue to be reserve to pay temporary loans promptly in case of emergency, and also authorized a further increase of the temporary loans of $50,000,000.

Joint resolution of January 17, 1863, authorized the issue of one hundred millions in legal-tender notes for the immediate payment of the Army and Navy.

The act of March 3, 1863, authorized a further issue of $150,000,000 of legal-tenders for the purpose of converting the Treasury notes which might be issued under th at act, and a further issue, if necessary, for the payment of the Army and Navy, and other creditors of the Government of $50,000,000 of legal-tenders and of Treasury notes, (compound-interest notes,) to the amount of $400,000,000, not exceeding three years to run with interest at not over 6 per cent. per annum, and made them a legal tender for their face value, excluding interest and convertible into United States notes. It also authorized the Secretary to receive gold on deposit, and issue certificates therefor in sums as low as twenty dollars, and certificates of indebtedness payable, principal and interest, in currency with no limitation of the amount that might be issued; and also authorized an issue not exceeding $50,000,000 in fractional currency exchangeable for United States notes in sums not less than three dollars, and receivable for any dues to the United States less than five dollars except duties on imports, the act of July 17, 1862, having authorized such issues and made them redeemable in sums not less than five dollars.

The act of June 4, 1864, authorized the increase of temporary loans to $150,000,000, at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent.

It will be observed that I have only referred to such acts or parts of acts as authorized the issue of currency, and have made no reference to those providing for permanent loans, and offered the people permanent investments for money. What was chiefly needed to develop the energies of our country was a medium of exchange whereby the Government could purchase supplies, and pay the Army and Navy, the civil list, and the wages of labor; and in providing for these, its own necessities, it furnished the people with a medium of exchange by which they were able to buy and pay for whatever commodity they needed, and their fellow-man had to sell. The whole business of the country was thus put upon a cash basis, and the mortgages and judgments that had encumbered the farms, workshops, warehouses, and homes of the country were paid and extinguished. So that the property of the people of the Northern States was at the close of the war freer from incumbrance than it had ever been from the settlement of the country. Such was now the progress of our country that new States were called into existence and admitted to the Union, and our industries were enlarged and improved in every direction. When the war began, before greenbacks had been issued, we had not the machinery in the country with which to spin and weave the clothing for the Army we were soon to put in the field; but when that Army was brought North to be disbanded, it was clad in clothes of our own manufacture, and clad with a degree of comfort that no other army had ever been. When the war began we could not make the iron from which to fashion a gun-barrel that might safely be placed in the hands of a soldier, and when it closed we could make better iron for that purpose than we could buy from any other people. Our railroads, especially those running north and south, had before the issue of greenbacks been profitless and in dilapidation, but when the work of reconstruction began they were mostly doubled-tracked, and dividend-paying.

But, sir, I have not indicated the sole and exclusive legislative cause of the improvement in the condition of the people of the country. Coincidently with the acts authorizing the issue of currency others were adopted which were scarcely less beneficent in their operation, inasmuch as they had the effect of securing to the American mechanic and artisan at least an equal chance in their own markets with the foreigners who, under the free-trade system, had enjoyed an almost undisputed monopoly.

The attempt to supply the Treasury with revenue by reducing the rates of duties on foreign goods having proved a failure, as such attempts always must, it became apparent, even to the friends of free trade, that the rates of duties on imports must be increased, or direct taxes be levied, and the act of March 2, 1861, increased the rates of duties and distinctly recognized the principle of protection. The act of August 5, 1861, made an additional increase in the rates of duties and of farther recognition of the necessity of protective duties. The act of December 4, 1861, imposed duties on teas, coffee, and sugars, which had been upon the free list. The act of July 14, 1862, provided for a temporary increase of the duties on imports. The act of March 3, 1863, provided specially for an increase of duty on paper and some other articles. The act of April 29, 1864, added 50 per cent. to all existing duties, and was to continue in force for sixty days. The act of June 27, 1864, continued it in effect to July 1, 1864. Meanwhile the act of June 30, 1864, providing systematically for an increase equal or greater than 50 per cent. upon the duties provided by the act of March 3, 1863, and preceding acts, went into effect. Further legislation of a like character was had March 3, 1865, July 28, 1866, March 2, 1867, and February 24, 1869, since which the acts of July 14, 1870, and June 6, 1872, have made considerable reductions in the rates of duty, and thus combined with the policy of contraction in prostrating our industresi and reducing the rates of wages throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, I pause at this point to correct an error into which the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has fallen, and which must not pass without correction. In the course of his able speech on Thursday last he presented a statement which seems to have been prepared with sufficient care to give it authenticity. It is as follows——

Mr. GARFIELD. I hold in my hand the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which gives the statement of the reductions. I have here a copy, which I did not take time to read when I addressed the Committee of the Whole the other day, but which I sent to the printers. By a mistake of the clerk who made the copy for me, the word "customs" instead of "internal" is placed before the first four years of taxation. I allowed my remarks to appear in the RECORD the next morning, without delaying their appearance for the purpose of doctoring them up.

Mr. KELLEY. If the mistake had been one which I supposed everybody would have corrected I would not have noticed it, but it has gone out with the appearance of such seeming careful preparation, that if not corrected now it might become a dangerous authority in the future. I will, therefore, proceed with the statement I had prepared. The figures given are as follows:

By the act of July 13, 1866, customs duties were repealed to the amount of		$65,000,000
By the act of March 2, 1867, customs duties were further reduced by the sum of		40,000,000
By the acts of February, March, and July, 1868, customs duties were still further reduced by the sum of		68,000,000
By the act of July 14, 1870, the reduction was:
On customs	$55,000,000
On internal revenue	29,526,410
		84,526,410
By the acts of May 1, and June 6, 1872, the reduction, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, was, for eleven months last year:
On customs	$44,365,364
On internal revenue	17,695,456
		62,060,820
Making a total reduction, since the close of the fiscal year 1866, of		319,527,230

Sir, had the course of legislation been as this statement alleges, the financial crash which came in last September would have overtaken the country more than four years ago. It would have come with the force of a tornado, and from causes so direct and palpable as to have excluded debate, such as is now taking place between the friends of contraction and those who desire to maintain a volume of currency adequate to the legitimate wants of the country, as to the cause of the recent crisis. It would not only have closed all the factories and workshops of the country, but all the custom-houses also; for it would have abolished the tariff system of the country, and left us dependent for revenue upon internal taxes alone. The acts of June 13, 1866, March, 1867, February, March, and July, 1868, are said to have repealed duties sufficient to yield $173,000,000 per annum; and those of July 14, 1870, and May 1 and June 6, 1872, have added to the repeal others which yielded $99,000,000. To show the grossness of this error, I point to the fact that we derived from customs in—

If, as the gentleman says, we had in those three years repealed duties enough to yield $173,000,000, what would have remained of our customs system? We would then have had free trade in a higher degree than has ever been practiced by a commercial nation, and its fruit would have been not only wide-spread bankruptcy, but wide-spread anarchy.

The gentleman's figures may or may not be correct. I know that the act of 14th of July, 1870, did repeal $55,000,000 of customs duties, and those of 1872 $44,000,000, but those repealed in 1870 were chiefly duties on raw material entering into our food or manufactures, and which competed in our markets with no American productions. Therefore, while they relieved the people of taxation, they did not impair the protection to our labor afforded by our tariff laws, as did the 10 per cent. reduction of 1872. The previous repeals were not of customs, but of internal taxes. They lightened the burdens of our people, and in some degree compensated the producing classes of the country for the contraction of the currency which was compelling them to borrow capital, to sell on credit, and to pay inordinate rates of interest upon the capital they borrowed.

And I take occasion to remark here and now that the repeal of these internal taxes did not essentially diminish the revenues of the country. The repeal stimulated its industries; it enabled employers to pay higher rates of wages than they could have done had these taxes been maintained, and thus enabled the people, both capitalists and laborers, to consume more freely of taxable and dutiable goods than they otherwise would have done. Their repeal thus more than compensated the current revenues for the apparent loss they were to sustain by the direct repeal. But as this is a divergence from the line of thought and illustration I am pursuing, I will not at this time elaborate the point.

Mr. Speaker, in his letter of February 13, 1865, to Hon. Schuyler Colfax, Henry C. Carey, the most profound and philosophic student of social science the world has yet produced, said:

Had it been possible, on the 4th of March, 1861, to take a bird's-eye view of the whole Union, the phenomena presenting themselves for examination would have been as follows:

Millions of men and women would have been seen who were wholly or partially unemployed, because of inability to find persons able and willing to pay for service; hundreds of thousands of workmen, farmers, and shop-keepers would have been seen holding articles of various kinds for which no purchaser could be found; tens of thousands of country traders would have been seen poring over their books, seeking, but vainly seeking, to discover in what direction they might look for obtaining the means with which to discharge their city debts; thousands of city traders would have been seen endeavoring to discover how they might obtain the means with which to pay their notes; thousands of mills, factories, furnaces, and workshops, large and small, would have been seen standing idle while surrounded by persons who desired to be employed; and tens of thousands of bank, factory, and railroad proprietors would have been seen despairing of obtaining dividends by means of which they might be enabled to go to market.

High above all these would have been seen a national Treasury wholly empty, and to all appearance little likely ever again to be filled.

Why was all this? The laborer needing food and the farmer clothing, why did they not exchange? Because of the absence of power on the part of the former to give to the latter anything with which he could purchase either hats or coats.

The village shop-keeper desired to pay his city debts. Why did he not? Because the neighboring mill was standing idle, while men and women indebted to him were wholly unemployed.

The city trader could not meet his notes, because his village correspondents could not comply with their engagements. The doctor could not collect his bills. The landlord could not collect his rents; and all, from laborer to landlord, found themselves compelled to refrain from the purchase of those commodities to whose consumption the national Treasury had been used to look for the supplies upon which it thus far had depended.

With all the difficulty resulted from the one great fact already indicated in regard to the laborer. If he could have found any one willing to give him something that the farmer would accept from him in exchange for food, that the farmer could then pass to his neighbor shop-keeper in exchange for cloth, that that neighbor could then pass to the city trader in satisfaction of his debt, and that this latter could then pass to the bank, to his counsel, his physician, or his landlord, the societary circulation would at once have been re-established and the public health restored.

That one thing, however, was scarcely anywhere to be found. Its generic name was money; but the various species were known as gold, silver, copper, and circulating notes. Some few persons possessed them in larger or smaller quantities, but, the total amount being very small when compared with that which was required, their owners would not part with the use of them except on terms so onerous as to be ruinous to the borrowers. As a consequence of this, the city trader paid 10, 12, and 15 per cent. per annum for the use of what he needed, charging twice that to the village shop-keeper, in the prices of his goods. The latter, of course, found it necessary to do the same by his neighbors, charging nearly cent. per cent.; and thus was the whole burden, resulting from deficiency in the supply of a medium of exchange, thrown upon the class which least could bear it, the working people of the country—farmers, mechanics, and laborers. As a consequence of this, they shrank in their proportions as the societary circulation became more and more impeded, while with those who held in their hands the regulation of the money supply the effect exhibited itself in the erection of those great palaces which now stand almost side by side with tenement houses whose occupants, men, women, and children, are counted by hundreds. The rich thus grew richer as the poor grew poorer.

Why was all this? Why did they not use the gold of which California had already sent us so many hundred millions? Because we had most carefully followed in the train of British free-trade teachers, who had assured our people that the safe, true, and certain road toward wealth and power was to be found in the direction of sending wheat, flour, corn, pork, and wool to England in their rudest form, and then buying them back again at quadruple prices, paying the difference in the products of California mines. Because we had in this manner, for a long period of years, been selling whole skins for a sixpence and buying back tails for a shilling. Because we had thus compelled our people to remain idle while consuming food and clothing, the gold meanwhile being sent to purchase other food and clothing for the workmen of London and Paris, Lyons, Manchester, and Birmingham.

Why, however, when circulating notes could so easily be made, did not the banks supply them, when all around them would so gladly have allowed interest for their use? Because those notes were redeemable in a commodity of which, although California gave us much, we could no longer retain even the slightest portion, the quantity required abroad for payment of heavy interest, and for the purchase of foreign food in the forms of cloth and iron, having now become fully equal to the annual supply, and being at times even in excess of it. That demand, too, was liable at any moment to be increased by the sale in our markets of certificates of debt then held abroad to the extent of hundreds of millions, the proceeds being claimed in gold, and thus causing ruin to the banks. To be out of debt is to be out of danger, but to be in debt abroad to the extent of hundreds of millions is to be always in danger of both public and private bankruptcy. The control of our whole domestic commerce was therefore entirely in the hands of foreigners who were from hour to hour becoming richer by means of compelling us to remain so dependent upon them that they could always fix the prices at which they would buy the skins, and those at which they would be willing to sell the tails. As a necessary consequence of this the nation was not only paralyzed but in danger of almost immediate death.

Such having been the state of things on the day of Mr. Lincoln's inauguration, let us now look at the remedy that was then required. Let us for a moment suppose the existence of an individual with wealth so great that all who knew him might have entire confidence in the performance of what he promised. Let us then suppose that he should have said to the laborers of the country, "Go into the mills, and I will see that your wages are paid;" to the millers, "Employ these people, and I will see that your cloth is sold;" to the farmers, "Give your food to the laborer and your wool to the millers, and I will see that your bills are at once discharged;" to the shop-keepers, "Give your coffee and your sugar to the farmer, and I will see that payment shall forthwith be made;" to the city traders, "Fill the orders of the village shop-keeper, and send your bills to me for payment;" to the landlords, "Lease your houses, and look to me for the rents;" to all, "I have opened a clearing-house for the whole country, and have done so with a view to enable every man to find on the instant a cash demand for his labor and its products, and my whole fortune has been pledged for the performance of my engagements;" and then let us examine into the effects. At once the societary circulation would have been restored. Labor would have come into demand, thus doubling at once the productive power of the country. Food would have been demanded, and the farmer would have been enabled to improve his machinery of cultivation. Cloth would have been sold, and the spinner would have added to the number of his spindles. Coal and iron would have found increased demand, and mines and furnaces would have grown in numbers and in size. Houses becoming more productive, new ones would have been built. The paralysis would have passed away, life, activity, and energy having taken its place; all these wonderful effects having resulted from the simple pledge of the one sufficient man that he would see the contracts carried out. He had pledged his credit, and nothing more.

What is here supposed to have been done is almost precisely what has been done by Mr. Lincoln and his administration; the only difference being that, while in the one case the farmers and laborers had been required to report themselves to the single individual, or his agents, the Government has, by the actual purchase of labor, and its products, and the grant of its pledges in a variety of shapes and forms, enabled each and every man in the country to arrange his business in the manner that, to himself, has seemed most advantageous. To the laborer it has said, "We need your services, and in return will give you that which will enable your family to purchase food and clothing." To the farmer it has said, "We need food, and will give you that by means of which you can pay the shop-keeper." To the manufacturer it has said, "We need cloth, and will give you that which will enable you to settle with the workman and the farmer." To the naval constructor it has said, "We need your ships, and will give you that which will enable you to purchase timber, iron, and engines." In this manner it is that domestic commerce has been stimulated into life, the result exhibiting itself in the facts that, while we have, in the last three years, increased the number of our houses and ships, our mills, mines, and furnaces, our supplies of food, cloth, and iron to an extent never known before; and while we have diversified our industry to an extent that is absolutely marvelous, we have been enabled to lend, or pay, to the Government thousands of millions of dollars, where before, under the system which made us wholly dependent on the mercy of the "most wealthy capitalists" of England, we found it difficult to furnish even tens of millions. The whole history of the world presents no case of a financial success so perfect.

Mr. Speaker, it is evident that Mr. Carey attributed the depression of the country, prior to 1862, to a lack of legal-tender currency, and ascribed the boundless prosperity it enjoyed after the laws providing for the issue of our inconvertible paper money had been carried into effect to the issue of a volume of such currency adequate to the industrial demands of the country. "The whole history of the world," said he, "presents no case of a financial success so perfect." This is a broad statement. Is it sustained by experience? That it is not marred by any degree of exaggeration I am confident, for the eminent teacher who uttered it is in the habit of weighing his words most nicely.

Let me, therefore, proceed rapidly to examine the facts of the case, and, continuing the line of illustration I have presented, let me recur to Table G, page 10, of the appendices to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a statement of the receipts of the United States from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1873, by calendar years to 1843, and by fiscal years ending June 30, from that time. This statement shows that the total receipts of the Government, during its whole existence, prior to June 30, 1873, from customs, internal revenue, and direct taxes amounted to $5,289,467,480.30. During the seven years to which I have heretofore referred, to wit, from 1856 to 1862 inclusive, the amount received from these sources—and I shall consider the receipts from no others—was $362,874,580.75; the average receipts per year having been something over $50,000,000. During the same years we received 1,033,697 immigrants. The immigration into the country is an element of wealth and taxable power that cannot properly be omitted from such a consideration as that in which we are now engaged. I therefore propose to present the two subjects in parallel columns:

Year.	Revenue.	Immigration.
1856	$64,022,863 50	200,436
1857	63,875,905 05	251,306
1858	41,789,620 96	123,126
1859	49,565,824 38	121,282
1860	53,187,511 87	153,640
1861	39,582,125 64	91,959

I pause for the present but to invite attention to the facts that the revenue received in 1856 was over $64,000,000, but in 1861 the receipts had sunk to but little more than $39,500,000, and that immigration, which in 1856 was over 200,000, had by 1861 fallen to less than 92,000. Free trade and money which falsely professed to represent gold had done their work. These were the results they had produced: Every industry of the country was paralyzed; no effort was making to develop its resources, and the vast army of unemployed laborers had served notice upon their brethren in their respective father-lands that they were better at home, let them endure what governmental oppression they might, than they could be in a republic which denied its citizens permission to earn wages by employing their industry upon its boundless stores of multiform raw material.

Let me now present the receipts from the same sources, and the number of immigrants received for another series of seven years, beginning with 1866. As I have said, the total receipts from the foundation of the Government to the close of the last fiscal year were $5,289,467,480.30. Let me now show that more than one-half of the whole sum, or $2,710,033,324.40, was received in the years 1866 to 1872 inclusive, during which the volume of our inconvertible currency was at its maximum. The annual receipts and number of immigrants were as follows:

Year.	Revenue.	Immigration.
1866	$490,248,219 12	318,494
1867	444,645,582 01	298,358
1868	357,340,334 82	297,215
1869	339,170,573 10	395,922
1870	379,667,233 81	378,796
1871	349,948,917 05	367,789
1872	347,012,464 49	449,483

The average receipts per year during this period having been $387,147,617.77, or more than $20,000,000 per year in excess of the total receipts of the last seven years of convertible currency and free trade.

Are not these results striking and instructive? To what will the bullionist and contraction philosophers ascribe them? Can they legitimately ascribe them to the fact that during the former period the people enjoyed such a measure of prosperity as might be had on a specie basis, and under the system of British free trade, and that throughout the latter period the poverty of the people of the Southern States was such that their best fields were unfenced and uncultivated, and they were without capital or currency with which to improve them or engage in any enterprise for the development of the resources of their richly endowed country? If this be not the cause, then it must be ascribed to the fact that currency was abundant; the business of the country was conducted on a cash basis; the rates of interest paid by the few who were compelled to borrow were low, and the prosperous and busy people of the North made the bulk of these enormous contributions without feeling the draft upon their annual profits to be onerous or oppressive. Who can contemplate the fact that more than half the revenues collected by our Government from its foundation to the 1st of July, 1873, was paid in seven successive years without perceiving that the cause of this ability was exceptional? In seeking for that cause we must examine only those facts which were exceptional in our history, as was the issue of inconvertible legal-tender currency, redeemable in the interest-bearing bonds of the Government and by its receipt for taxes. Thus only can this momentous fact be interpreted or accounted for.

But let me still further enforce this great lesson, even at the expense of something of repetition, and in doing so reduce the conclusion I have uttered to a demonstration.

The first issues of our paper money, demand notes, were provided for by the acts of July 17 and August 5, 1861. The act which authorized the issue of the first $150,000,000 of legal-tenders was that of February 25, 1862, and it was consequently in 1862 that the people began to experience the beneficent influence of a currency founded upon the credit of a Government of illimitable resources. Having shown that in seven years in which that currency was most abundant and efficient the revenues of the Government exceeded 50 per cent. of the whole amount collected from its organization to the close of 1873, let me proceed to show that the receipts during the eleven years from 1863 to 1873 inclusive amounted to about two-thirds of the entire revenue the Government had received from customs, internal revenue, and direct taxes, or twice as much in eleven years as had been received in the preceding seventy-two years. The total receipts, as I have already twice stated, were $5,289,467,480.30. The receipts from 1863 to 1873 inclusive were $3,628,478,934.64, or about 65 per cent. of the whole sum. They were as follows:

Year.	Revenue.	Immigration.
1863	$108,085,533 96	176,282
1864	212,532,936 05	193,416
1865	205,593,048 88	249,061
1866	490,248,219 12	318,494
1867	446,645,582 01	298,358
1868	357,340,334 82	297,215
1869	339,170,573 10	395,922
1870	379,667,233 81	378,796
1871	349,948,917 05	367,789
1872	347,012,464 49	449,483
1873	302,134,091 35	421,294
Total	3,628,478,934 64	3,546,110

Weary as gentlemen may be of these statistical details, I must proceed to complete my demonstration. The special facts of each year are before you. Let me, on one other point, invite your attention to a comparison.

The total revenue collected by the Government from the sources under consideration, from its organization to the 1st of July, 1862, the year in which greenbacks were authorized, was $1,660,298,545.66, and gentlemen who will consider the figures I have given them will find that the aggregate income from these sources for the four years of 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869 was not $27,000,000 less than the total sum that had been collected under the specie-basis system of currency and the operation of free trade, which, with brief intervals, had prevailed from the foundation of the Government. The total for these years was $1,633,404,709.05.

The account stands thus:

From the organization of the Government to 1862	$1,660,298,545 66
During 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869	1,633,404,709 05

I trust gentlemen will consider and digest these facts. They are worth all the dogmas of sophists and doctrinaires that have ever been promulgated; and demonstrate the wicked absurdity of those who accuse our Government of maintaining a forced loan, and characterize our currency as lying and fraudulent. That for the present it is not, as those who issued it intended it should ever be, redeemable, I admit. It was redeemable so long as the Government kept faith with citizens and accepted the greenback in exchange for interest-bearing temporary loans; and I am, as gentlemen well know, striving to induce Congress to adopt a bill, the effect of which will be to again make it redeemable by accepting it in exchange for temporary-loan certificates bearing a low rate of paper interest, such as are known to the people as three sixty-five bonds. By the adoption of this measure, which will restore the redeemability of the greenback and increase its value by giving it additional use and profit, the reissue of the part of the $400,000,000 we have withdrawn and the release of the bank reserve by the substitution of greenbacks for national-bank notes, the prosperity of the people will be restored, and our reservoir will again be filled, notwithstanding the vermin that infest it and haunt the brain of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

But, Mr. Speaker, conclusive as is the proof I have adduced, more pregnant evidence may be presented of the wealth-creating power of an adequate supply of the medium of exchange called money, whether it be composed of a material possessing intrinsic value, or be but paper pledges of the credit of a people whose resources are beyond the possibility of doubt—such as the greenback, which, like our bonds, is a pledge of the faith and credit of the American people.

Annual taxes are a draft upon the annual profits of the people; and the question, did the enormous taxation shown by the tables I have presented exhaust the resources of the people? is pertinent to the issue we are considering. How large have been the annual profits of the American people since we abandoned the ancient theory that paper money must represent an amount of gold in hand sufficient for its redemption? Have they increased or diminished? Have they been large enough during the last eleven years to endure an annual average taxation of nearly $400,000,000, or has the drain thus made upon them by the Government exhausted their profits and impoverished them? Sir, in no period of our history has the taxation of the General Government borne a smaller relation to the current profits of the American people than during these same eleven years; for, sir, in no previous period of that duration, or indeed I may say of all the years from the foundation of the Government, could the people have lent it as much money as they did while paying these taxes, till we had availed ourselves of the talismanic power of a sufficient volume of currency for calling into action all the capabilities of our people, who, by their inventive power and industry, converted into forms of utility and beauty the vast and varied resources of our country.

When the war closed the Government of the United States was debtor to the American people on various forms of evidences of debt to the amount of nearly, if not quite, $2,000,000,000, every dollar of which had been loaned subsequent to the issue of the first emission of our inconvertible paper money. At that time but little of our funded debt had gone abroad. Neither England nor France had taken any of our gold-bearing bonds before the war had closed and the work of national reconstruction had begun. The American people trusted their Government, but foreigners had little faith in it. In Germany a market had been found for a limited amount; but our people were the creditors of our Government for nearly the total amount of the outstanding obligations. And what were they, and what was their amount? Mr. Gibbon, whose statistics are gathered from the exhibits made by the Treasury of its condition on the close of the fiscal year which terminated on the 30th of June, 1866, on page 37 of his work entitled The Public Debt of the United States, shows that the indebtedness of the Government to the people was as follows:

Five-twenties of 1862	$514,780,500 00
Five-twenties of 1864 and 1865	207,425,000 00
Seven-thirties past due and convertible	139,301,700 00
Seven-thirties past due and convertible, (subject to conversion in 1867 and 1868)	806,251,550 00
Temporary loans, certificates of indebtedness, and compound-interest notes subject to conversion	305,579,336 65
Treasury notes and fractional currency	431,144,312 96
Total	2,404,482,399 61

Almost every dollar of this grand total—certainly $2,000,000,000 of it—was held by the American people; for the $321,742,650 of ten-forties, sixes of 1881, and the bonds issued to the Pacific Railroad Company, which are not embraced in this statement, represented the whole sum, or very nearly the whole sum, of our indebtedness then held in foreign countries.

Contrast these generous contributions with the results with which the credit of the United States was hawked and peddled, regardless of rates of interest, during the decade preceding the issue of greenbacks, and in a time of profound peace; and he who is not willfully blind will find in the contrast an absolute demonstration of the utter inadequacy of any volume of currency that can be safely based on the limited amount of gold now in existence to effect the legitimate exchanges making, and to be made, between the American people.

Sir, let me in this connection impress another point upon the House. Most of these loans were made to the Government in money, the current coin of the realm, the legal-tender of the nation, and no loans of this or any other country are ever taken on such terms by foreigners. They purchase foreign bonds with commodities. It is true now, as it was in the days of Solomon, that "the rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender;" and this truth is as applicable to nations as to individuals. The nation that may not or will not rely upon its own people for its resources, but borrows from foreigners, must accept such terms as the lender may be pleased to offer. What England and Germany have given us in exchange for our gold-bearing bonds is well told by Professor Bonamy Price, of Oxford University, in his article on Lombard Street, in Fraser's Magazine for October, 1873. Let me read what he says:

England is described as "the greatest moneyed country in the world; as having much more immediately disposable and ready cash than any other country." Is that so; is it certain that England has more gold and bank-notes than any other country? The Bank of France—not the present hoarders—had fifty millions of English pounds in gold before the war. At that time we would rather have backed France than England for cash. But, then, it is plain that by money and cash is meant the "loan fund" of banks, which is further illustrated by reckoning up deposits—"money deposited in banks." Is there no need here for pointing out that deposits are merely debts, and the money in the bank only a register of names and figures? "If a nation wants even to make a railway, it is sure to come to the country of banks for the money; and English bankers are great lenders to those who lend to foreign states." But what do they lend? Cash—a loan of fifty or one hundred millions of cash? The very mention of such an idea excites a smile. There is no consciousness awake to the fact that loans to foreign railways are taken out in locomotives and rails; and loans to foreign states leave England in some form of English goods. The province of Canterbury, in New Zealand, is making new railways with astonishing rapidity; yet it is "a poor state, deficient in accumulated riches." How, then, does it acquire the means of constructing railways? By sending money, cash, to England? It has none to send; but it has wool, and the wool crosses the water and a bill is drawn, and iron is bought in England and another bill is drawn, and they cancel each other, and the railway is made. Banking has been employed, but no money or cash. Even if more iron is bought than the wool can pay for, the agency of banks merely finds some one who will lend iron to the colony.

Gentlemen will please remark that Professor Price says that "loans to foreign states leave England in some form of English goods." This is true; and the exchange received for our gold-bearing bonds has not been money, but Birmingham and Manchester wares, which we should have produced for ourselves. As if to emphasize this fact, the professor immediately proceeds to say:

The wealth of England, which she can lend to individuals or to states, is not cash, but commodities.

Gentlemen may attribute to the subtle laws of trade the fact that debtor nations exchange their interest-bearing bonds for perishable commodities. But, sir, potent as are these laws in securing the ascendency of creditor nations, England will not accept them as the sole or sufficient means for her protection. She advises all the rest of the world to adopt free trade, and with undoubting faith to stake all their interests upon the law of demand and supply. Her currency is nominally on a gold basis, and would be contracted by heavy shipments of gold were she to permit them to occur. But with all her love of free trade and professed respect for the law of supply and demand, she does not permit them to occur; but when such events are threatened, arbitrarily interposes the power of government to prevent them. She has recently twice constrained the course of our trade; and, in order to prevent the contraction of her currency which would follow the export of bullion, has compelled the United States to buy its own bonds, at such prices as they could be had in a market circumscribed by the financial necessities of England. I make this statement on the authority of Mr. BOUTWELL, late Secretary of the Treasury, who, in the course of his remarks in the Senate, on the 22d of January last, said:

When the negotiations were going on in London for the sale of the largest amount of United States bonds that have ever been sold there at one time, it was foreseen by the Bank of England that a quantity of coin would accumulate, as the proceeds of these bonds to the credit of the Government of the United States. As a matter of fact, there was an accumulation of about $21,000,000. The Bank of England, foreseeing that there would be an accumulation of coin to the credit of the United States which might be taken away bodily in specie, gave notice to the officers of the Treasury Department of the United States that the power of that institution would be arrayed against the whole proceeding unless we gave a pledge that the coin should not be removed, and that we would reinvest it in the bonds of the United States as they were offered in the markets of London. We were compelled to comply. * * * * * *

There is another fact, known to all. We recovered at Geneva an award against Great Britain of $15,500,000. When this claim was maturing the banking and commercial classes of Great Britain induced the government to interpose, and by diplomatic arrangements through the State Department here, operating upon the Treasury Department, secured the transfer of securities, and thus avoided the transfer of coin.

Do not these statements, so humiliating to us and so contradictory of the advice England persistently imparts to other countries, prove not only England's insincerity, but that the nation that goes abroad to borrow still becomes the servant of the lender, as in Solomon's day? And do they not illustrate also the patriotism and good sense of Postmaster-General Creswell, who in his last annual report says?

Sound policy dictates that the Government should lose no opportunity of borrowing from its own people, at a low rate of interest, for the purpose of discharging an indebtedness abroad or relieving industry and enterprise at home from the trammels of taxation. But when the Government can arrest panic, restore confidence, call forth the hoarded treasure of the country, and revive the pursuits of industry, by a simple pledge of the people's credit for the people's security, who will say that that pledge should not be given?

I have said that at the close of the war our own people held nearly all of the national debt. Will you have proof of this? You will find it in the facts shown by Gibbon, that in October, 1866, one-half of the loans and discounts carried by the banks consisted of Government securities, and that these institutions held, including the bonds deposited for currency, more than one-quarter of the entire national debt.

Alas, sir, how sadly things have changed in this respect. There is scarcely that percentage of our debt now held by all the corporations and people of the country. When the work of contracting the currency began, when the temporary-loan certificates, the seven-thirties, the compound-interest notes, and the certificates of indebtedness, were withdrawn from the reserves of the banks, and called in and converted into permanent loans in the form of gold-bearing bonds, and the gold of the Treasury was applied to the purchase and withdrawal from circulation of $44,000,000 of greenbacks, the rapid process of contraction compelled the American people to convert their securities into available capital for current purposes; and as that mistaken process continued, our people became less and less able to hold permanent loans, though they bore a rate of interest much higher than is paid by any European nation, but which is, withal, greatly below the rates demanded from their customers by the bankers and credit-mongers of this country.

Thus has our indebtedness been driven abroad, and thus have we become the servants of the money-changers of England and the Continent. So far and so rapidly has this fatal policy been pursued, that at last the Government has been compelled, by the overruling law of necessity, to emit part of its hoarded greenbacks, by the purchase of which it had supplied England with gold; to suspend the sinking fund; and to implore Congress to restore war taxes in a time of profound peace; it has brought the people to bankruptcy, and fears it may share their fate. Meanwhile the development of the country has ceased, the great thoroughfares which were to have connected the Atlantic and the Pacific on our northern and southern borders, together with many shorter roads, are abandoned, at least for the present; a vast percentage of the machinery of the country stands idle; one-third of the furnaces have been blown out; rail and bar mills are without employment; thousands of skilled artisans in the cities, during months of enforced idleness, have exhausted the little sums which through long years they had garnered in savings-banks, and, with their families, are gathering about cold hearthsides and eating the nauseous bread of charity. Not only has the tide of immigration been checked, but each outgoing steamer carries long lists of returning emigrants, and European papers teem with all too faithful accounts of the grand movements in our metropolitan cities for the relief of the suffering poor, the unemployed clerk, artisan, and laborer; and with such a text they are admonishing those who by the hundreds of thousands have looked forward to a free home in a broad land of republican institutions, that they are surer of the comforts of life in the lands of their birth than they could be here.

Gentlemen, denying that the currency has been unduly contracted and saying that money is abundant and the rates of interest easy, point to financial articles in New York papers to prove the truth of their assertions. Sir, if money be abundant, why are the poor exhausting their garnered treasures and compelling the savings-banks to call in overdue mortgages to meet the pressing demands of depositors? If money is plenty, why are the mill, the forge, the furnace, the factory, and the workshop deserted, and those whose toil filled them with the hum of busy industry now being fed by the hand of charity? No, sir, money is not plenty; and he who needs to borrow any considerable sum upon mortgage or a six months' note, let his security be what it may, will find that it is scarce at any rate which the profits of current business will enable him to pay. Not only is money scarce, but the fear of further contraction paralyzes the energy of the people. The consciousness that the volume of money now accessible to the American people is inadequate to the legitimate business of the country, and may be further reduced, holds enterprise in restraint and prevents men of ordinary caution from engaging in the production of commodities they may have to sell on a falling market or to hold indefinitely, because their market has been destroyed by depriving the mass of the people of the power to purchase and consume as they did when fully employed at remunerative wages.

This unhappily is not declamation; it is but a feeble statement of the condition of affairs existing throughout our country. And without pausing to present a large array of facts to prove its truth, I invite attention to the condition of but one institution—that of the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society. Its story is that of every similar institution in the Eastern States. Its charter prohibits it from receiving more than $500 in any one year from any one depositor. It is pre-eminently the savings-bank of the laboring people, in which, by depositing small sums, many of them from one to ten dollars, they accumulate a few hundred dollars as a reserve for sickness and age, or a fund upon which to start into another and more attractive pursuit in life. The following statement of the number of its receipts and payments during the last year well illustrates its character:

RECEIPTS.

From one to ten dollars	12,600
From ten to twenty dollars	12,082
From twenty to thirty dollars	10,678
From thirty to fifty dollars	10,401

This statement illustrates the persistency of the toil and thrift of the depositors, and gives an idea of the reluctance with which they would draw upon the funds they had thus slowly accumulated. How largely they have been forced to draw, this other statement will show. It gives the number and amount of deposits received and of payments made during the year 1873, and the months of January and February, 1874:

I apprehend, as I have said, that the course of business of this venerable and well-conducted institution may be taken as an illustration of that of the savings-banks throughout the country. It presents some noteworthy facts. The coming financial catastrophe had been casting its shadow before for many months; indeed, the industries of the country have never entirely reacted from the financial stringency of the autumn of 1872; yet, if gentlemen will observe the figures I have presented, and compare the amounts received from January to August inclusive with the amounts paid out during the same period, they will discover that though our industries were not as prosperous as they had been, the receipts were $3,197,627.47, and the payments but $2,964,860.03, showing that during those eight months the humble depositors in this one institution had added $232,767.44 to their accumulations. If they will then note the receipts and payments from September to February inclusive, they will find that the receipts were but $1,719,895.04 and the payments were $3,381,113.01, showing that these same laborious, thrifty, hopeful people had, in these six short months, exhausted $1,661,217.97 of the fund they had accumulated by sacrifices and economies unknown to the bankers who tell us that money is plenty, and point to the treasures locked in their vaults, which are alike inaccessible to the laborer and to the man of energy and enterprise whose means are restricted.

But, sir, I have wandered into a digression. I meant to ask whether the figures I had exhibited, the statements I had made, could be real; whether I had not been involved in fantasy; whether such power as the figures indicate can possibly reside in a single instrument of society, the medium of exchange, of which, as Mr. Carey says, "the generic name is money, and which may be of gold, silver, copper, or circulating notes." Let me, therefore, see whether I find confirmation or contradiction by proceeding to survey a somewhat wider field of our recent history.

First, let me invite attention to the fact that it is shown by the census of 1870, that the annual production of our workshops, farms, mines, and fisheries for that year was over $7,000,000,000. The census takes no cognizance of establishments in which the acknowledged production was less than $500 per annum, though the Middle and Eastern States abound in such establishments, yet it presented as an ascertained result $6,843,559,506. This grand total was divided thus: The products of factories and workshops were $4,232,325,442; of the farm, $2,447,538,658; of the mine, $152,589,974, and of our fisheries, $11,096,522. How these results compare with those of preceding years, in which our currency purported to be on a gold basis, let me give you a few illustrations from such authorities as I have at hand.

The census of 1850 and that of 1860 included the productions of mines and fisheries with those of the factory and workshops, while, as I have shown, each of these sources of wealth is embraced under a separate head by the census of 1870. Bearing these facts in mind, let us compare the productions of 1870 with those of the two preceding decades.

The total productions of the factories and workshops, and of mines and fisheries, in 1850, were $1,019,106,616; in 1860 they were $1,885,861,676; but in 1870 the productions of the factory and workshop alone were $4,302,453,616; while, as I have shown, those of mines and fisheries amounted to over $163,000,000.

Whence came this enormous increase in every department of production? Is it—I reiterate the question—the result of five years of intestine war upon a scale greater than such war had ever before been conducted? Gentlemen will not assert this; but I ask them to bear in mind the fact that such war prevailed through nearly half the decade; and to tell me what it was that during this period of waste and destruction gave such an impulse to the productive arts and resources of the country, and why that impulse has been recently paralyzed or withdrawn. The former facts were coincident with our acceptance of the duty of protecting our labor and the issue of an adequate volume of the medium of exchange, and the paralysis came on apace with the reduction of protective duties and the withdrawal of a large part of that medium, or, in popular phrase, the contraction of the currency.

In 1850 we had 7,000 miles of railroad; in 1860, 31,000. But to measure the progress of the seven years preceding the issue of inconvertible paper money, let me say that in 1863 we had 33,170 miles. In 1870 we had 52,898 miles, and at the close of 1873 we had 71,564 miles, of which 4,190 had been constructed in 1873.

Our production of iron in 1850 was about 800,000 tons, from which figures it differed but little, some 20,000 tons, in 1860; but by 1870 it had swollen to 1,900,000.

Our production of wool in 1850 was 52,000,000 pounds; in 1860 it had grown to but 60,000,000; but in 1870 it was more than 170,000,000.

Of anthracite coal we produced in 1850 3,358,899 tons; in 1860, 8,513,123; in 1870, 15,849,899; and in 1872, the last year for which the figures have been made up, 19,026,125. In contemplating these facts relating to fuel, we should remember that fire is force, and animates the steam-engine, imparting its wonderful energy to the improved mechanism of these days, adding sometimes a thousand-fold, yes, more, to the productive power of man.

But I must not weary gentlemen with details, and hasten to bring to their attention the fact that the census of 1860 showed us that the American people had gathered together, including the property brought by the founders of Jamestown and in the Mayflower, $14,000,000,000 of wealth. This was the grand result of the enterprise, industry, and thrift of the American people from the settlement of the country to 1860.

But what did the next ten years do in this direction? According to the learned authorities cited by gentlemen, the people during this decade had been robbed by a forced loan; their business had been destroyed by an inflated currency, values had been unsettled, and the adventurers of the world had been invited to overstock our markets, because they were said by sophists to be the best in which to sell and the worst in which to buy; and yet, while suffering all these imputed disadvantages, while bearing forced loans and suffering an inflation of the currency, they accumulated in ten years $16,000,000,000 of property, $2,000,000,000 more than had been created in all the previous life of the nation. Gentlemen who are ever ready to ignore facts, which cannot be reconciled with the theories they have inherited, may say that this wealth was unreal; that it was fanciful; that it will melt away when our currency is brought down to the "hard-pan" of a gold basis. But, sir, I point to the marvelous growth of the great cities of the country—to New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, Saint Louis. I point to the myriads of beautiful towns and thriving cities that have sprung up in every part of our country. I point to the amply endowed institutions of learning, the public libraries, halls of science, and temples of worship, which have been reared and endowed since 1860. I point to the railroads connecting States and cities and oceans with each other, and bearing the products of our workshops, our fields, our mines, and our fisheries, from one part of the country to the other, and to our sea-ports, for exportation to all parts of the world, and ask whether these will melt away. No, sir, they will not melt; they are not mere phantasmagoria; they are substantial and enduring. But by the further contraction of our currency the buildings, the roads, the workshops, and the fields, may be transferred from the men of energy who have erected or cultivated them, by the process of sheriff's or marshal's sale to the men whom we have invested with the power of making the money of the country, and of contracting it when they wish to buy, and of expanding it when they feel that it will be well to sell, in order that they may buy in again when they shall have produced the next financial crisis.

But this is not the time to discuss the question of banking. The bill before the House is a revenue bill—a bill proposing to repeal taxes, and I have already said that in the peculiar condition of our country I think it would be injudicious to give it the effect of law. I hope the House will reject it; but in saying this, let me add that I hope it will reimpose none of the war taxes which have been repealed. There is no necessity for any additional taxation. Embarrassed as we are, such is the inherent power and the resources of the American people, that the current revenues will not only meet the current expenditures, but will, before the year closes, have made a generous contribution to the sinking fund; and should Congress in its wisdom determine to restore to circulation the balance of the forty-four million reserve now held by the Treasury, and to release the greenbacks now held as reserve by the banks, our industries will be so far reanimated as to enable us to begin at the next session, or the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, to reduce the internal taxes which now burden with such grievous discrimination the grain fields of the West and the tobacco fields of the South, and annoy the people of the whole country by the petty exactions made through the stamp system. The history of the past eleven years precludes the possibility of doubt on this point.

Nor, sir, would I consent to borrow a dollar to meet current expenses. Did it seem to be necessary to add to the current revenue, I would refuse to make a loan for that purpose, or to add one dollar of taxation to the burdens borne by the people, while we refuse to give them a medium of exchange by which the laborer may be employed, and earn his daily bread and contribute to the revenues of the Government by his expenditures. The loan I would make would be in the direction of economy. It would be to borrow temporarily such funds as our own people may be able to lend the Government, on coin dition that their money should be refunded to them on call; and in consideration that it was received on this condition, I would make the distinction in the rate of interest that is now made between the rate for call loans and loans on bond, mortgage, or long note. From $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 can be had in a few months at the low rate of 3.65 in paper, with which gold bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest may be bought in open market, or called by the Secretary of the Treasury, who, I am sorry to see, is again supplying England with gold by buying up greenbacks. Were he required to accept loans on such terms as I indicate, he might reduce his interest account by calling 6 per cent. gold bonds and paying for them at par. This process involves an economy greater than any or all those proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. It will throw no workmen out of employ, as would the suspension of work upon our public buildings; it will leave no unfinished buildings standing in each of our great cities, a monument of our incompetence to manage the affairs of this great and expanding country; but will give us a full Treasury, amply replenished by the free contributions of a prosperous people.

Mr. FIELD obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. GARFIELD, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 9, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D.D.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, the telegraph brings to us to-day the painful intelligence of the death of a distinguished citizen of the Republic, who once occupied the exalted position of President of the United States. Mr. FILLMORE's death will sadly touch the hearts, not alone of the people of the State in which he lived and led a career so useful and so full of honor, but the hearts of the whole people of our great country. As the news shall reach other lands, even there will be found those who will do honor to this mournful event; for the knowledge of his virtues, name, and fame was not confined to his own country, which had so honored him. This providence is one of general public interest as well as private grief, in which all can unite to pay appropriate honor and respect. It will not be expected, nor is it usual, to make remarks in this place which would be fitting to such an occasion elsewhere, but in view of the sad event, and in respect to the memory of the dead, I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask what the precedents have been in similar cases.

Mr. FENTON. I am informed by the Chair that this is the usual course.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only say for myself that while I am willing to follow any well-established precedent on the occasion of the death of so distinguished a citizen as Mr. FILLMORE, late President of the United States, and would pay to his memory any compliment that has been usual in the case of any one who has occupied the high position of President of the United States, I do not believe that this example is a wise one. If there is no precedent for it I shall feel at liberty to vote against the motion. If, however, the Secretary, who is better informed on this subject than I am, says that there is a well-established precedent of adjourning over in the case of the death of any one who has held the office of President of the United States, I certainly will not object in this case; for I would extend to the memory of Mr. FILLMORE every consideration and every compliment ever extended to any one who has held that exalted office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senate adjourned on the death of Mr. Buchanan; and the Secretary does not recall the instance of other ex-Presidents dying during the session of Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is certain that Congress adjourned on receiving intelligence of the death of the first President. It was in the resolution upon that event, introduced by John Marshall, and drawn by Henry Lee, that the memorable words, afterward repeated by General Lee in his eulogy before the two Houses of Congress, were originally employed: "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Mr. SHERMAN. If the precedent has been established, I shall make no objection.

Mr. FENTON. I have not looked into the precedents in cases of this kind, but it seems to me altogether appropriate that the Senate should adjourn, and therefore I make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York, for reasons assigned by him, moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 9, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. C. KINGSLEY, Canon of Westminster and Chaplain to the Queen of Great Britain and to the Prince of Wales.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, intelligence has reached the city this morning of the death last evening, at his residence in Buffalo, New York, of one who has occupied such conspicuous station in public life, and such worthy position in private life, and in the estimation of his fellow-citizens, that it becomes us to arrest the further proceedings of this body for this day that we may take some proper notice of such an event.

MILLARD FILLMORE occupied in his own State of New York, in this House of Representatives, in the other branch of Congress, as its presiding officer, and in the office of President of the United States, such position before the public as to draw attention to his character in a manner that left no uncertain judgment of his ability, his conscientious discharge of all the duties devolving upon him in official life, his fidelity to every public trust, and his truthfulness as a private citizen to every man and to himself. When such a man passes away, it becomes us to take such notice of the occurrence that we ourselves may derive some benefit from the lesson of his life; that we may bear testimony to those who are to follow us that such characters are worthy of our emulation in the discharge of our duties here, and deserving the attention of our children as fitting examples for imitation.

In conformity, therefore, as well to usage as to what is becoming us under the circumstances, I have felt it my duty to call the attention of the House to this sad intelligence and to suggest such action in reference to the funeral of the deceased as custom and his deserts may seem to require at our hands. As Mr. FILLMORE was for a long time a distinguished member of this House from the State of New York, it seems proper that to some member from that State should be conceded the opportunity to submit such remarks or such form of testimonial as may be deemed appropriate. And for that purpose I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the House is not unaware that the other branch of Congress has already adjourned in honor to the distinguished citizen of New York, now deceased—a man who has been known as a statesman to all the country. In consideration of the almost stainless purity of his private life, the moderation of his character, the distinguished services which he rendered at one time as the leader of this House, as well as in the capacity of Chief Magistrate of the Republic, it is peculiarly appropriate that the House should take some action in the matter. I therefore offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk:

The Clerk read as follows:

The House having received with profound sensibility and sorrow intelligence of the death of MILLARD FILLMORE, ex-President of the United States, at Buffalo, New York, on the 8th instant, it is hereby

Resolved, That the members of this House, of which he was a distinguished member and leader, unite in honoring the purity of his private character, the ability, probity, and patriotic motives which illustrated his public career, and the grace and dignity which marked the retirement of the latter years of his life.

That as a token of honor to the many virtues, public and private, of the illustrious statesman whose death in the ripeness of his age has arrested the attention of the nation, the Speaker of this House is requested and authorized to appoint a committee of seven members to attend the funeral of Mr. FILLMORE on behalf of this House, and to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the relatives of the deceased.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this occasion pass without at least saying a few words. To the present generation of the American people, Mr. FILLMORE was known as the President of the United States, his service in which office has been referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in most appropriate terms. It was my good fortune to know Mr. FILLMORE personally, and to be associated with him as a legislator when he was a member of the House of Representatives, thirty-three years ago. In that Congress, in which he and myself were colleagues from the State of New York, he was the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, a committee performing at that time not only the duties now devolving upon it, but also those which now belong to the Committee on Appropriations. In the discharge of his duties as chairman of that committee, in his devotion to the public interests and to the business of this House, (I say it with all respect to his eminent successors who have served in the same capacity from that day to this,) he has not, in my judgment, had his equal. His intellectual character was broad, practical, and demonstrative; and these characteristics, together with the industry and general capacity which he devoted to the discharge of his duties as a member of Congress, laid the foundation for the eminent usefulness which he thereafter exhibited in the exercise of the highest trust known to the nation.

I have risen merely to say this much, and to second the resolution offered by my colleague, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, it was but a few moments since, so it happened, that the sad intelligence reached me of the death of this eminent man. I rise to add nothing to what has been said, certainly to protest against nothing; and yet I could not let the occasion pass without suggesting that MILLARD FILLMORE, the day he died, was something more than a citizen of the State of New York. He was adopted by the country; he became in a special sense a citizen of the country, a citizen of the United States. As the leader of this House, representing a district from the State of New York, he made a distinguished and honored name—a name which was the occasion of his being selected by the nation and elevated to the second place in the gift of the people. A sad dispensation of Providence transferred him (under the provisions of our Constitution) to the highest place in our land, and as we perhaps too proudly regard it, the highest place in the civilized world.

I shall not now speak of his administration as President of the United States further than to say it is one toward which its supporters and friends always recur without feelings of dissatisfaction or regret—one they take delight in remembering.

When he had retired from office into private life, and the clash of arms resounded, his voice was heard in no uncertain, no doubtful or equivocal phrase to indicate his opinion of the contest and of the duties it imposed upon all who loved their country. From that time until the day of his death, in all the excitements we have passed through, in all the discussions and agitations which have come upon the country, he has not, certainly by any public utterances, or that I am aware of by any private utterances, sought to interpose his opinion or bring the weight and influence of his character in any manner to contest, to embarrass, or to influence his successors in the discharge of the official duties appertaining to any of the high positions which he had successively filled.

His character has been singularly pure, his conduct singularly forbearing and appropriate. In private life I long since learned he had the respect of all his neighbors. Strangers who visited the city of his late residence, without regard to political sentiment or former personal relations, made it part of their pleasure to pay him their personal respects. He lived in retirement from the high office of President of the United States, as I am sure the American citizen will be gratified to see all others live who may fill the same office in the future years of this Republic. As a retired statesman I know not where to look for a finer model.

Indeed, Mr. FILLMORE may be regarded as a model American citizen, the outgrowth of our institutions and our form of government. A young man coming into life without any advantages of fortune, birth, social position, unaided save by the powers given him by his Maker, educated with such facilities as his country afforded him, he rose step by step, by his own good conduct and high personal endeavor, until he reached the topmost round of the ladder on which he first set his ambitious foot.

I concur most heartily with gentlemen who have spoken, that it is meet and proper we who have succeeded him here in the discharge of public affairs should pay becoming tribute to his memory.

Mr. COX's resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following as the members of the committee under the resolution just adopted:

SAMUEL S. COX of New York, HENRY L. DAWES of Massachusetts, HORACE MAYNARD of Tennessee, JAMES N. TYNER of Indiana, WILLIAM A. WHEELER of New York, ERASTUS WELLS of Missouri, and MARK H. DUNNELL of Minnesota.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAWES, (at one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, yesterday morning the sitting of the Committee on the Judiciary was unavoidably prolonged five minutes past the hour at which the Senate meets. Thus detained, I was to my regret, absent at the moment when allusion was made to the death of MILLARD FILLMORE, and when the Senate immediately adjourned. Indeed I had supposed the day of the funeral to be the day the Senate would observe, in harmony with the action of other departments, as indicated by the President of the United States in his feeling published announcement.

The death of Mr. FILLMORE having been once brought to the notice of the Senate, I do not refer to it again merely to express my respect to his memory or my sympathy for those who more immediately mourn for him. Of the political conflicts in which he appeared, of the measures he espoused, or of the part he played in the national drama, this is not the time to speak. But his long career, the exalted trusts he held, his arduous lot, the urbanity and dignity of his bearing, and above all his blameless and spotless private life, suggest thoughts upon which we might dwell with profit and propriety. I forbear, however, to attempt his eulogy, having risen for a different purpose.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the action due to the occasion. Of precedent and usage, we have none. There is no instance of the death in like circumstances of one holding relations to the Senate like those held by Mr FILLMORE. He was Vice-President of the United States, and so President of the Senate, and in that character he became Chief Magistrate of the Republic. His death, therefore, differs from all others in our history, save one, and differs from that one in time and circumstance. Mr. Van Buren died on the 24th of July, 1862. Congress was not in session. Mr. Pierce died on the 8th of October, 1869. Congress was absent in vacation. Mr. Buchanan died on the 1st of June, 1868. Congress was in session, and the House of Representatives appointed a committee of its members to attend his funeral. On the day of the funeral, the 4th of June, the Senate adjourned, there being no proceeding save only a mere announcement of the event by Mr. Buckalew and a motion to adjourn. Mr. Buchanan, however, although an ex-President, had never been the chief officer of the Senate. Mr. Tyler died in January, 1862. Congress was in session; but civil war was flagrant, and the posture of Mr. Tyler and of the State whose citizen he was forbade expression or observance here. Mr. Tyler's is the only death during a session of the Senate of one who was President of the United States and also the presiding officer of the Senate by the choice of the nation.

It is known to the Senate that the House of Representatives has appointed a committee of its members to attend on its behalf the funeral of Mr. FILLMORE. It will, I think, be agreeable to the Senate to evince its respect and sensibility in the same way. I send to the Chair and ask the adoption of a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York offers a resolution, and asks for its present consideration. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret of the death of MILLARD FILLMORE, formerly Chief Magistrate of the United States and Vice-President, and that a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Chair to attend the funeral on behalf of the Senate.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, remembering as we do the long and distinguished services of ex-President FILLMORE, the purity of his private life, and the dignity of his retirement after having filled the highest position in the Republic, I had prepared, and have in my hand, resolutions which seemed to me appropriate to the Senate, but my colleague has anticipated me, and it only remains for me to second his resolution, and ask its adoption.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I rose just now for the purpose which has been indicated by the Senator from New York, [Mr. FENTON,] to second the resolution which was offered by my friend who sits near me, [Mr. CONKLING.] It seems to me both fit and proper that this body should pay some respect to the individual who at one period of time presided over its deliberations. I am one of the very small number of members in this body who then held a seat here, and I am gratified to be able to say at this time, that I shall carry with me, so long as my memory shall last, a recollection of the urbanity, the courtesy, and the ability with which the duties of the chair were then so eminently discharged; and having been then in a very small minority in this body, I can now bear testimony to the perfect impartiality with which the rights of that minority were at all times recognized, conceded, and protected. Filling so broad a space in the affairs of the public, we should be derelict in the duty we owe to ourselves, to the body, and to the country, were we to do less than that which is indicated in the resolution which has been offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from New York.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, for reasons approved by other and older Senators, it seems objectionable for me, should the Chair assign me a place on the committee just raised, to be absent during the next two or three days. I ask (regretting to be compelled to do so) that my name be omitted from the committee. If the engagements of my colleague permit him to visit Buffalo, I ask that the place which would be given me may be given him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently appointed Messrs. FENTON, HAMLIN, and BAYARD, the committee.

JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of C. De Montreville, M. D., grandson and heir, and for the co-heirs of Cornelius R. Suydam, A. C. De Montreville, and H. Townsend Coles, deceased, original claimants, praying indemnification for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of Dr. B. Hahn, of Columbia, Monroe County, Illinois, praying to be compensated for services in the late war, and for the value of a horse killed in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, requesting their Representatives and instructing their Senators to procure a law of Congress preventing railroads or transportation companies from making unjust charges or discriminations; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Jackson County, Kansas, praying for the removal of what is known as the Prairie Band of Pottawatomie Indians, and for the opening of their reservation to sale and settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for relief in certain cases where homestead entries have been canceled and lands awarded to railroad companies; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maine, in favor of converting the United States arsenal at Augusta, Maine, into an arsenal of construction; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHURZ. I present the memorial of the National Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, embodying certain resolutions passed February 21, 1874, recommending that the proposition made by Mr. James B. Eads, to open the mouth of the Mississippi on certain conditions, be adopted. The memorial states that all "the resolutions were approved and unanimously adopted by the board, and a meeting of the exchange at large being called, were unanimously adopted by the members of the association." I move the reference of the memorial to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of citizens of Albany, and a petition of citizens of Utica, New York, numerously signed, protesting against the extension of the patent granted to Henry A. Wells, April 25, 1846, for improvements in machinery for making hat-bodies; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of James E. Temple, of Memphis, Tennessee, son and heir, and for the co-heirs of William Temple, deceased, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the passage of a law giving bounties to the surviving soldiers who served in the war with Mexico and were honorably discharged; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in relation to improved water communication between the East and the West; which was referred to the select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of Samuel H. Leavitt, late Company C, Eighty-sixth New York Volunteers, praying payment of arrears of pay as lieutenant; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. I present a petition containing 335 names of the principal business men of the city of Peoria, Illinois, asking for an increase of the currency or free banking; also the petition of 2,454 citizens of the State of Illinois, praying for the same thing. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of William Mason, with additional evidence, praying that his claim for damages under a contract for furnishing guns may be recommitted to the Committee on Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition and accompanying papers of Mrs. E. E. Hebert, of Louisiana, asking compensation for property taken by the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives in Congress from that State to use their influence and to vote for the modification of the homestead law of the United States in behalf of officers, soldiers, and seamen honorably discharged from service; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of George Richards, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I present the petition of W. G. Nichols, William McGilvrey, and 8 other persons, residents of the State of Maine, who represent that they were citizens of the United States and engaged in commerce in strict conformity to the laws of the United States, that their property was destroyed by armed cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, or their tenders, or the Shenandoah after she left Australia, and that they have received no compensation for such loss, and they pray for compensation out of the Geneva award. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented a memorial of Bradford & Folger, creditors of the New England Mutual Marine Insurance Company of Boston, in relation to the Geneva award; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I also desire to lay before the Senate a resolution passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts, and ask that it be read, laid on the table, and printed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, in the year 1874:

Resolve rescinding and annulling a resolution passed December 18, in the year 1872, relating to Army registers and national flags.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in General Court assembled, That the resolution passed on the 18th day of December, 1872, at the extra session of the Legislature of that year, relating to a bill introduced in the Senate of the United States concerning the Army Register and regimental colors of the United States, be, and hereby is, rescinded and annulled.

SENATE, February 11, 1874.

Passed. Sent down for concurrence.

S. N. GIFFORD, Clerk.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 13, 1874.

Concurred.

GEORGE A. MARDEN, Clerk.

SECRETARY'S DEPARTMENT,
Boston, March 3, 1874.

I certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolve.

OLIVER WARNER,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to call the attention of the Secretary to the fact that there is a letter from his excellency the governor, which should be read also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Boston, March 3, 1874.

SIR: By vote of the 27th ultimo the General Court requested me to forward to our Senators and Representatives in Congress copies of the resolution passed by the present Legislature, rescinding and annulling the resolve passed by the Legislature of 1872, concerning the Army Register and national battle-flags. It gives me pleasure to comply with this request, and herewith I inclose a copy of said resolution.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

W. B. WASHBURN.

Hon. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
Washington, D. C.

The resolve was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WEST presented the memorial of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, praying that national aid be extended by Congress to the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the memorial of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, on the subject of the removal of obstructions at the mouth of the Mississippi; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. HAGER. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in regard to the congressional election in that State. The elections in our State are biennial. As the law now stands the next congressional election will take place the coming fall. It will be the only election in the State of California this year. Elections are quite expensive there, and the Legislature desire to have a change until the State election, which occurs in the following year. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition and accompanying papers of Child, Pratt & Fox, praying compensation for stores furnished the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army in 1861; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of Rosa Rachel Wyatt, praying payment for stores and supplies taken by the Federal Army in Bryan County, Georgia; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Henry Cook, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Walworth County, Wisconsin, praying for the issue by the Government of legal-tender notes in lieu of the present national-bank notes, and that the volume thereof may not be subject to undue contraction or expansion; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of L. P. Morton, Chester Griswold, and other citizens of character in the State of New York, the holders of bonded indebtedness against the State of Louisiana. Their petition recites that the Legislature of that State is engaged in a process of repudiation; and they pray the passage of the bill introduced by the Senator now occupying the chair, [Mr. CARPENTER,] or of some tantamount legislation which will protect their rights. I move the reference of this petition, with an accompanying paper, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as that committee is already charged or to be charged with the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW MEXICO LAND CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting three reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claims in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage, and to ask for its present consideration, as there seems to be immediate necessity for the fund.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill appropriates $10,000, to be added to the contingent fund of the Senate, and to be drawn on the order of the joint committee, for the expenses to be incurred in the investigation of the affairs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not going to object to this bill; far from it. I ventured the other day to make an inquiry about it; and I should be glad now if the Senator from Maine would state what is to be done with so large a sum, and what is to be, as far as he knows, the whole required appropriation. That the Senator from Maine may not suppose that I am unduly curious, as I see the chairman of the Committee on Transportation is present, I wish to mention a fact. The Committee on Transportation, sitting during the recess for weeks and months, visiting many States, traveling many thousand miles, and taking a heavy volume of testimony, I am informed by the chairman of the committee—he will correct me if I am in error—expended, aside from the earnings of the stenographer, about $3,000. Am I right?

Mr. WINDOM. That is right.

Mr. CONKLING. That was the expense of a committee conducting an investigation in several widely separated States for many weeks and traveling thousands of miles. In this instance the Senate has listened to memorials stating with earnestness, and apparently stating with supposed definite information and conscientiously, grievances and wrongs, the scene of which is the city of Washington. A committee has been raised to hear these grievances, and before, as the public journals report, a charge or specification has been made, we are called upon to appropriate $10,000, to carry forward the inquiry. If it were paid to witnesses, $10,000 would pay the attendance fee of five thousand witnesses summoned for a day each from Washington; they receive two dollars a day. I cannot suppose that half the sum stated will be needed as fees of witnesses, and would be well pleased to hear from the Senator from Maine some statement of the necessity, and if he can give it, an opinion whether $10,000 is to be the whole of the appropriation, or whether we are to be called upon for more.

I need not say, I hope, that I will vote, and vote promptly, for all appropriations necessary to make this a thorough investigation; but I want to guard against voting an unnecessary sum, and having witnesses and pretended witnesses and schemers understand that so much money may be obtained if a way can be found to get at it, thus tempting them to besiege the committee with applications and importunities to testify or furnish evidence or to do various things which perhaps would be better and more honestly done by those moved from higher considerations than the hope of getting traveling expenses or fees.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, from the nature of the case, it is impossible for the Committee on Appropriations to have any definite information as to what may be the expenditure required for this investigation, and I suppose it is really out of the power of the investigating committee itself to indicate specifically what expenditures it may find necessary. The Senator from New York will understand that it involves the expense of witnesses, of course. Then it involves a very large expenditure undoubtedly in the way of stenographers and clerks if the thing is carried on in the way these matters are generally. The Committee on Appropriations have no experience on this subject which justifies them in the belief that this investigation, if it is carried so far as we have reason to believe it may be, will cost less than the sum named in the bill; and I should be very glad myself to find that the expense will be brought within the limits of this appropriation.

The Senator from New York has alluded to the expenditure of a committee, which leads me to make a remark upon the general subject of our expenditures in this class of investigations, and I should be very glad if the attention of the Senate of the United States could be brought to this subject so as that we would get rid of this method of investigating affairs. We have standing committees to which all these matters appropriately belong, and by referring such matters to them we should certainly save very great expense, in my judgment. The Senator alludes to the Transportation Committee. So far as I have been able to judge, the affairs of that committee have been conducted with great economy; but the expenditures are not over yet; they have not been all audited and adjusted. So far the expenditures are $9,328.77 paid. How much remains behind unsettled we do not know.

Mr. CONKLING. That is $3,000 for the stenographer and $6,000 for all the other expenses.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no specification of items.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to say that the entire expenses of the committee during the summer have been audited, with perhaps the exception of one or two hundred dollars, not amounting to over $200; and $200 will not increase the entire expenditure of the committee, over and above the stenographic expenses, to the sum of $6,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What does the Senator understand to be the whole amount of money paid out on this account?

Mr. WINDOM. Over $9,000, including the stenographer; and there were over a thousand pages of evidence taken by the stenographer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I make no comment on the subject; my attention was called to it by the statement of the Senator from New York; but I have before me an exhibit of the expenditures of this committee, as well as an exhibit of the expenditures for all the special and general committees of the Senate who were charged with special investigations during the Forty-second Congress, and the aggregate amount is $167,125.47.

Mr. CONKLING. For investigations alone?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Simply investigations, special investigations.

Mr. CONKLING. For the last session?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; for the Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. The last Congress?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. Please give the aggregate amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is $167,125.47. The expenses of the Select Committee on Alleged Outrages in the Southern States were $80,419.97. I believe that was a joint committee. The Committee on Privileges and Elections inquiring into certain charges of bribery and corruption in connection with the recent senatorial election in Kansas expended $18,201.79. The Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment——

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will allow me to remind him, as I see the chairman of that committee is not here, and the second member of the committee is in the chair, that those great expenses were in bringing witnesses from a long distance. It cost four or five hundred dollars apiece, I think, to get witnesses here from Kansas, and many of them were not worth much when they came.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly that is true.

The Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment expended over $13,000. Then there were the expenses of the investigations in regard to elections in Louisiana, Kansas, &c., $13,300. I have no purpose to refer to this except in response to the Senator from New York, who queries whether it is not possible to control an investigation comprehending so much, both in interest and magnitude, as the one set on foot now, within $10,000. I say my own experience in regard to these matters does not justify any belief that we are likely to bring it within that sum. So the Committee on Appropriations had no hesitation in reporting this sum, and particularly as it is within the control and audit of the investigating committee itself.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether his statement includes the expenses of committees of the House of Representatives of the same character?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; only the committees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. My colleague dropped an expression upon which I should like a little more information from him. He says he thinks from the information the Committee on Appropriations have that this $10,000 will not be likely to cover the expense. I should like to know really what that information is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My colleague should not understand me as saying that. I say in the beginning it is very difficult to have any information on the subject which would justify a reasonable judgment as to what the cost will be, and the experience of the committee, drawn from similar investigations, does not authorize an inference that it will come within this amount, and I mentioned some of the investigations here under our own jurisdiction close at hand. A great deal may be said about this one way and another, which it is hardly worth while for me to take up the time of the Senate with at the present time. I offered a resolution some days ago which was calculated to control these expenditures; but objection was made to it and it went over. At some future time I will renew it.

The Senator from Rhode Island remarks very properly that a great deal of these expenditures comes from the habit of drawing testimony from remote portions of the country, summoning witnesses from a long distance. Take, for instance, the investigation of matters in Kansas, running up to twenty-odd thousand dollars. That was chiefly from the necessity of drawing witnesses from that distance; and each witness cost (without reference to the time which he might be kept here) perhaps $400, or between $300 and $400. The same thing goes on constantly. That might be checked to some extent, but, after all, the remedy in my opinion is to confine these investigations to the appropriate committees of the Senate. Do that, and we shall have less of them. We shall have them more thorough and at less expense, because we have got our machinery. The moment you make a special committee, you institute new machinery for the whole performance, new clerks, new stenographers, and all that sort of machinery.

Mr. HAMLIN. Inasmuch as an investigation has been ordered into the affairs of this District, I want to see it carried forward thoroughly, fully, without any qualification; but I am one of those who believe that an appropriation of $10,000 will insure an expenditure of $10,000 in doing that thing, while an appropriation of $5,000 would only involve the expenditure of that amount doing precisely the same thing and doing it precisely as well. That is my judgment. Therefore, if the appropriation were for half the sum, I think the work would be accomplished for that. If, however, it were found at any subsequent period of time that more means were actually required, more means could be supplied. But if you make the appropriation of $10,000 now, you virtually invite the expenditure of that sum; and I think, if we carefully consider the figures to which my colleague has already referred, we shall find that $5,000 would be vastly a larger appropriation to be expended in this investigation than the expenditures in any one case to which my colleague has alluded, because they were of a peculiar character, many of them were distant from this place, the meetings of the committees were held distant from this place, or the witnesses were called from a very long distance to this place; and this involved large expenditures. According to my recollection, he stated that the Committee on Retrenchment, in their investigation in New York, spent about $3,000. I do not recollect the exact figures, but it was in the neighborhood of $3,000, and it was an investigation long and thorough.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That was $13,039.55.

Mr. HAMLIN. That expenditurewould be equal to $40,000 in this case, if you consider the circumstances under which that investigation was made compared with those of the one to be made here now, where the witnesses are directly on the spot. The Committee on Retrenchment sat five weeks, I believe, in New York, and then they were here calling witnesses from New York, being obliged to be here to take care partially of their official duties out of committee. They were obliged to call witnesses in large numbers from New York. Without going into the details, I cannot doubt, and the Senator looking at me, [Mr. HOWE,] will correct me if I am wrong, that the expenses of that committee were largely in summoning witnesses from New York here.

Mr. HOWE. Very largely.

Mr. HAMLIN. For these reasons I think it would be wiser, more economical, and better calculated to do justice to the case to limit this appropriation to at least one-half of what the committee reported. I therefore move to strike out "ten" and insert "five" before "thousand."

Mr. PRATT. I rise to make an inquiry of the Senator from Maine who sits farthest from me, [Mr. MORRILL.] I ask him to restate the amount of expenses of the joint select committee for investigating the alleged outrages in the Southern States. I did not catch the amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I gave the amount—$80,419.95.

Mr. PRATT. I was a member of that joint committee—composed, I believe, of thirteen members—and it will be remembered that it was in session from the early part of summer, in the year 1871, until the meeting of Congress the succeeding winter. It was in session here in the city of Washington during the summer months, and in the fall months the committee was broken up into sub-committees who visited various Southern States. I was one of the sub-committee of five that visited the States of Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi. That sub-committee were engaged day after day, and frequently their sessions were protracted into the night, for a period of six weeks. They took testimony in the towns of Huntsville, Montgomery, Demopolis, and Livingston, in Alabama, and at Macon and Columbus, in Mississippi. They had with them a clerk, a stenographer, and a deputy sergeant-at-arms. The sum total of the expenses of the sub-committee traveling to these various points, paying bills of every kind, was within the sum of $5,000, and they were occupied industriously day after day, for the period I have stated—six weeks or more. The witnesses in some instances had to be called from a considerable distance, one witness I remember a distance of about two hundred miles; and frequently they came distances of twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty miles; and yet the bills of this sub-committee, all told, were within the sum of $5,000. It does seem to me that that sum is quite sufficient to defray the expenses of this joint committee sitting here in the Capitol, and deriving their testmony principally from citizens living here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no object to procrastinate this debate, and do not desire to say anything further in regard to the subject. I only express my own belief that if you cut this down to $5,000, they will come back for $5,000 more; and it seems to me that as none of us can tell how much it will cost, we might as well leave it in the hands of the committee to whom we have confided this subject; and as the bill itself subjects the audit to the committee, and they have the control of it, I hardly think there is any danger in allowing the bill to go as it is. Still I shall make no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] moves to amend the bill by striking out $10,000 and inserting $5,000.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 28.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to give the committee all it asks. I do not suppose it will spend any more than is necessary. The accounts are to be audited by the committee. We do not require them to spend $10,000; but authorize them to spend $10,000 if, in their judgment, it shall be necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wish to inquire whether the expenses of the stenographer and printing are to be paid out of these $10,000; or what portion of the necessary expenses are to be paid out of the $10,000?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let the bill be read. It specifies.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does it include printing?

Mr. ANTHONY. O, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it includes the stenographer?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Nothing but the stenographer and witnesses.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me the chief expense of this committee will be the stenographer; and I have often thought the Senate ought to adopt a reform in that direction by employing a stenographer by the year. I know that we pay stenographers for reporting in a single case, perhaps, as much as the whole expense of the committee. For instance, the expenses of the stenographer of the Committee on Transportation, of which I happen to be a member, it seems, are about $3,000, while the entire expenses of the committee, traveling all over this country for weeks and weeks, were only $6,000. If this $10,000 covers the expense of the stenographer, with the mass of papers that it is said are before the committee, the sum is not too much; but I am disposed at the outset to vote for $5,000, because it is very easy for us to increase the amount. As a matter of course it is easy to increase the amount hereafter; but if you once appropriate $10,000, it is very apt to be expended. I, therefore, shall vote for the smaller sum.

I merely rose to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of changing the method of employing stenographers by this body. It seems to me that the resolution authorizing a committee like this ought not to authorize them to employ a stenographer, but there ought to be some officer by that name designated for the use of the Senate at a reasonable salary, say $5,000 a year, if you please, to do that kind of work for all the committees, when called upon. I have no doubt that one stenographer in that way would render all the service that is needed in that line, and thus save a very large sum of money in the course of the year.

Mr. SARGENT. It was the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, when this matter was before them, that an expenditure of $10,000 would be needed for this purpose. It is apparently the judgment of the joint committee that this amount is needed, from the fact that the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who is acting chairman of the committee during the illness of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] has introduced his bill, and proposed this as the amount with which the Treasury will probably be burdened. Now, I have great confidence in the chairman and acting chairman of the committee, and in their discretion and their desire to guard the Treasury, and I pay great regard to any recommendation which they make in this matter. I think the Committee on Appropriations were right in reporting this amount. I trust it will not be cut down one-half, because there is no obligation on the part of the investigating committee to expend more than is absolutely necessary to carry on the investigation, and they are not likely, considering their character, to spend more because we appropriate the larger amount.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator observes that it was the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations that this sum would be necessary to do this work. May I ask him for the elements of that judgment, for the data upon which it was formed?

Mr. SARGENT. We reasoned quite largely upon the cost of similar investigations, running from $80,000 down to $3,000—of course a very large opportunity to strike an average, but this is far below the average.

There are some practices which have grown up in these investigations which perhaps ought to be corrected, and which I have no doubt a vigilant chairman of a committee could correct without the necessity for legislation; but if these practices shall have become so strong that only legislation can cure them, it will not be done by cutting down the amount of the appropriation, which would seem to stint the object and show Congress to be unfavorable to the particular investigation. In that case the remedy is by legislation, which shall particularly name the mischiefs which are desired to be corrected. For instance—I did not intend to speak of it, but I will do so in order to direct the attention of the Senate to, I think, one of the abuses connected with all these investigations, and with this investigation if the circumstance shall occur more glaring than in many others—it is understood that the stenographer who reports is entitled to fifty cents per folio of one hundred words for all that is printed, whether furnished to him in print or writing; whether a mere exhibit appended to the original testimony which he takes down and copies out, or not. I do not know that fifty cents for one hundred words is too much for the testimony actually taken down and copies of which are handed to the clerk of the committee. But when you supplement to that a large mass of exhibits which have been handed in, in this case I understand some one or two thousand pages of written matter furnished by the District authorities in answer to questions which have been put by the committee, which probably will not even be touched by the stenographer, the abuse is evident. It is the custom of these committees to send such matter to the Public Printer to be printed for the use of the committee; and it must be printed for their convenience, because to copy it out for the use of each member, or having one member to wait until another has got through with it, would cost very much more and would be extremely inconvenient. Hence this matter scarcely goes into the hands of the stenographer at all. But I understand the custom is to allow him to charge fifty cents a folio for all the mass of matter, and in this case it cannot amount to much less than the book which I hold in my hand. [Exhibiting a bulky document.] I believe that the chairman of this committee can say that this is not a just construction of the custom heretofore existing for the compensation of such person; or that if it is the custom, it will be broken up.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it a good way to enable him to say that, to vote $10,000?

Mr. SARGENT. I say that, still voting the $10,000.

Mr. CONKLING. My point is this: is that a good way to enable the chairman of the committee to make a stand against this thing of paying for a great volume as if it were written out when it has never been touched?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think it is. I am not arguing that the appropriation of $10,000 rather than $5,000 will direct the attention of the chairman to these things; but I do think the discussion of this matter will direct his attention to it, and he will be very apt to inquire into the authority to pay the stenographer for reporting documents with which he has no connection, except from their being stitched in the same report; and it is the duty of the clerk of the committee, if there is a clerk to the committee, to make up such documents and append them to the report.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to say that the rule the Senator from California refers to is not an invariable rule. I know that Mr. Brailey, the stenographer of the committee of which I had the honor to be chairman this summer, did not make such charges. If the matter furnished only covered two or three pages, or half a dozen pages of manuscript, he did charge for it; but where printed matter was submitted he did not; and I did not certify to his charges; he did not make them.

Mr. SARGENT. I am very glad to hear of the exception; and I think it should become the general rule. Now the Senator from New York inquires, what is the basis upon which we judge that $10,000 is the proper amount? I ask him upon what basis does he judge, what are the elements of his calculation, that $5,000 is sufficient?

Mr. CONKLING. With my friend's permission I beg to make two observations. First, the Senator has stated in part the basis on which the committee judge, which is that such a volume as he holds up in print is to be paid for, say, at fifty cents for one hundred words. The Presiding Officer of this body and I, in professional ways, are able to estimate somewhat the size of such a charge as that—fifty cents for one hundred words—unknown to any fee-bill in ancient or in modern times.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is not such a charge often paid for recording deeds?

Mr. CONKLING. Recording deeds is very different. Now the Senator from Minnesota impairs entirely the basis which my friend from California referred to, and he shows that there is not even a usage, enormous as I think such a usage would be, warranting any gentleman in charging for a great mass of labor, none of which he performs. But I have not answered the question, and I will answer it now, and I will do it by an inquiry. I ask my friend whether in the course of his long experience in the House and his shorter experience here, he can name an instance in which an investigation has cost $10,000, or any such sum, if it were conducted at this Capitol, and consisted in the examination of witnesses residing here? And I add to my question my testimony, that although within the last fourteen years I have been a number of times upon investigating committees sitting here, and examining witnesses who were here, and not paid for coming here, I have never known an instance which I can recall, in which the expense has been as great as $5,000 would be in this case. Of course, I distinguish between such a case as this and bringing witnesses from Kansas or even witnesses from New York.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no instruction to this committee limiting the investigation to witnesses summoned from this city. If there were there would be very much force in the remarks of my friend from New York. But one of the questions before this committee is the expense and the comparative expense between this and other cities of the improvements which have gone on here. It is alleged on the one side that these improvements have cost 25 per cent. less than such improvements in Chicago, New York, or any other city of the Union. On the other side it is alleged that most enormous prices have been paid, a third or a half more than in any other city in the Union. How are you going to get at the facts in that matter? I suppose by summoning experts from Chicago, Saint Louis, or any other city where the members of this committee may think there are men residing who can throw light on that proposition. I speak merely of that instance, and I have no doubt there are other points as to which it may be necessary to obtain the testimony of persons living at a distance, and I think that is a complete answer to the question of my friend.

I am aware that there have been investigations in this matter on the part of the other House, which I had supposed to be thoroughly exhaustive; many of these things have been gone over by the regular committees of the House; for instance, I may allude to the investigation in the last Congress by the District of Columbia Committee. I think if we could get at the cost of that committee we should find that it equaled $10,000, for it ran over several months; there was a very large number of witnesses, and the volume of the report was very large when it came from their hands. After these investigations in one House or the other have taken place, as this question is still urged on the attention of Congress, and anything we have done heretofore to investigate this matter or put it at rest has been entirely futile, I desire that every advantage shall be put into the hands of this committee, either by expenditure of money or by their expenditure of time, their own time or that of Congress, by which this thing shall be ventilated clear to the bottom, that it may be known whether these assertions which go out from this city to papers in all parts of the country that we have a "Boss Tweed" administration of District affairs are true or false—in justice to the gentlemen who have charge of the interests of this city and the legislation of Congress. If they are innocent, if these are slanders, I want it to be as clear as daylight, that if the blush of shame can be brought to the face of the slanderers, it may mantle their cheeks. On the contrary, if they are right, and there is this corruption beneath the surface, which they insist upon exposing and ought to be exposed, let this committee be as vigilant as they are, and let them show that this corruption does exist, and these men be hurled out of office, as they deserve to be if they are corrupt and unfaithful in the discharge of their duties there. Now, by cutting down this committee to $5,000, I do not believe they can discharge this duty; and I do not further believe that by putting $10,000 at their disposal, they will spend one dollar more than is necessary.

For these reasons, and for reasons influencing the Committee on Appropriations, I shall vote against the amendment, and for giving them an amount adequate to the purpose.

Mr. STEWART. If the point suggested by the Senator from California is thoroughly examined, I am willing to see $10,000 expended on it. That point is, what is the comparative cost of the improvements in different cities? The government of large cities has become in modern times, in the United States, a very serious problem. Almost every administration of almost every city is more or less involved by the influences that surround them, and they are not able to get things done for anything like the same price that private individuals can. There are so many influences at work about them that it is universally admitted, among men who speak of these things, "You have got to conciliate voters," and conciliate this influence and that influence; and it would be a good thing for the people of the United States to commence the investigation for what reason it is that public works in cities are so enormously expensive.

I know nothing of the details of this matter. I do not know what will be developed. I see that a great deal has been done. Whether it has been done cheaply or not, or whether it has been done comparatively cheaply or not, I do not know, because I have not the facts; but it does seem almost impossible, where the voters must be satisfied and where they elect the officers, to get city expenditures anywhere within reasonable bounds. It perhaps results from the fact that so many administer the affairs of cities who have no interest in the money to be expended. There is no such difficulty in the country; it is in the cities. Popular government is government by the masses in cities who want to be employed, they voting for their employers, and in consequence the price of making improvements in the cities of the United States is alarming. I believe in this city there has been more done for the same amount of money, by the looks of things, than usually occurs. But whether that be so or not, I should like to see the testimony. I do not think the fact that there has been more or less done would necessarily imply that there had been more or less fraud. I do not think that is a controlling element; but there are combinations, and influences are arranged in cities by which they run up prices beyond all calculation. I believe this city could be much more cheaply governed if you were to apply the principle of the Constitution that Congress should have the exclusive right of legislation here. If there was no other legislative body, and no body of men to conciliate but the Government of the United States here at the capital, as was provided in the Constitution, I believe then we could get the minimum of expense for public works in cities and set an example to the rest of the country. I should like to have a comparison drawn as to the expense of these works, and an investigation as to the embarrassments and reasons that create the necessity for high prices, if there are any, so that we can judge something of them, so that we can judge something of this experiment of having a sub-legislative body in the District of Columbia. I do not believe there is any such necessity. Let us have something of an idea of whether that has had anything to do with the increased expense of public improvements. If the committee think that $10,000 is necessary in order to carry on this comparison, if they are carrying on this comparison, I certainly think it would be of great importance. If they say $10,000 is necessary, let us have the investigation, and let us vote all that is necessary for the purpose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is a very strange opposition to this resolution. The Senate has appointed a committee to investigate charges that have been preferred against the management of the affairs of this District. I suppose there is no Senator here who has not the utmost confidence in every member of the committee; not only that he will discharge the duties imposed upon him impartially and faithfully, but that he will do it with as much economy as is practicable. That committee has come here and asked for an appropriation of $10,000 to defray the expenses of that investigation. What will be the aspect to the country if the Senate now opposes granting that sum of money? The impression will go out and be heralded through every paper in this country that the Senate is disposed to cover up the frauds that are alleged to exist in this District.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, on which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I took the floor, as I stated at the time, with a view of yielding to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] if he was well enough, and if not I should occupy it myself. He being here and ready now to occupy the floor, I yield to him, that he may speak first.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I trust the Senator from Michigan will allow us to take the vote on this appropriation bill. I suppose there will be no further desire to speak on the subject.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If there is no further discussion, I am disposed to yield for that purpose. I will first yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who I observe desires the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending order will be laid aside informally.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The state of my health is such that I cannot attend, for the present at least, the meetings of the joint special committee on the affairs of the District of Columbia. I have therefore to ask the Senate to excuse me from further service upon that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks to be excused from further service on the joint committee for investigation of matters in the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator will not ask to be excused. I hope he will soon be in sufficient good health to attend that committee. He has taken part so far in laying the foundations for the investigation that I should hope he would feel at liberty to continue. I hope he will not ask to be excused.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I have only to say, in response to the kind suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, that I think it is due alike to the Senate and to the government of this city that the meetings of the committee should be attended by the members, and I foresee that for some days it would be prejudicial to my health to attend the meetings. I therefore cannot do otherwise than ask the Senate to excuse me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks to be excused. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and he is excused.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to make a remark. I have been in attendance on the District investigating committee this morning. I should feel inclined to move to postpone the pending order so that the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations to meet the expenses of that committee might be considered now and passed upon; but I am told that while I was not in the Senate, while I was discharging my duties upon that committee, that bill came up and some remarks were made to which it may be proper that I should reply. As I heard not one word of them I prefer to read them in the paper before I reply. I shall therefore ask the Senate to-morrow in the morning hour to take up that bill and pass it.

WEST POINT VISITORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the appointment as members of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, on the part of the Senate, Messrs. HOWE and DENNIS.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief of William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of Indiana Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1271) for the relief of John T. Watson, of Cincinnati, Ohio, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. CONOVER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jesse E. Peyton, attorney of Mrs. Elizabeth Montgomery, heir of Captain Hugh Montgomery, praying compensation for the services of her father and for losses sustained by him in the revolutionary war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 349) to create a reservation in the Territory of Washington for the Cœur d'Alenes and other Indian tribes therein named, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 37) for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of Indian depredations, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 348) to amend an act entitled "An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 420) to amend an act entitled "An act for the restoration of certain lands to homestead entry and to market in the State of Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 297) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances of appropriations remaining on the books of the Indian Office, June 30, 1873, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 355) to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Oregon by reason of Indian depredations, and the bill (S. No. 513) to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Southern Oregon and Northern California by reason of Indian depredations in 1872 and 1873, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 278) to provide for the manner of paying annuities to Indian tribes under treaty stipulations or legal enactments, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 457) to abrogate and declare void a certain portion of the treaty with the Sioux Indians concluded April 29, 1868, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of William J. Patton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on the Judiciary, who were by a resolution of the 12th of March last instructed to inquire and report at the December session of the Senate whether the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or any company authorized to build a branch road to connect therewith, or any assignee of such company, will be entitled to lands or bonds for any road which such company may hereafter construct, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to submit a report accompanied by a bill.

The bill (S. No. 587) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts, approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes, was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870; which was read and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1930) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aid-de-camp on the staff of General Spear, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Roundtree, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1779) for the relief of William E. Childs, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of W. L. Parvin and Henry A. Green, late California volunteers, reported a bill (S. No. 589) for the relief of W. L. Parvin and Henry A. Green; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 586) creating a port of delivery at Helena, in the State of Arkansas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. MCCREERY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of an Indian reservation in Siskiyou County, in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

SUSAN D. GALLOWAY.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway, to report it back with an amendment. I will state to the Senate that this bill has passed the House twice and the Senate once, and failed to be signed by some neglect.

The amendment of the committee is to insert "D" in lieu of "L" as the letter of the middle name. The bill is for relief, and one that the evidence sustains thoroughly, and as that is the only amendment, I ask the Senate now to agree to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides for the payment to Susan L. Galloway, widow of Captain James L. Galloway, late of Company E, First Florida Cavalry, the full pay and emoluments of a captain of cavalry from April 23, 1864, to August 31, 1865.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out the letter "L" and insert "D."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Susan D. Galloway."

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

A bill (H. R. No. 2359) to authorize the Secretary of War to reserve from sale ten thousand suits of old and disused Army uniform clothing, now in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and to transfer the same to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson, presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, late an officer in the United States Navy.

RECOMMITMENT OF A BILL.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Committee on Revolutionary Claims have instructed me to move that the bill (S. No. 418) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. BOREMAN. I introduced the other day a bill (S. No. 543) to provide for holding the district court at Martinsburgh, in the district of West Virginia, which was not printed. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make a motion, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Education, which is agreeable to him. It is to add one member to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that one member be added to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the Chair was authorized to appoint the additional member of the Committee on Education and Labor, and Mr. PEASE was appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NORWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 590) for the relief of Rosella Rachel Wyatt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 591) granting the right of way to the Seattle and Walla Walla Railroad and Transportation Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 592) granting a pension to John R. Gaines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWNLOW asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 593) to admit certain sculpture free of duty; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 594) for the relief of Charles M. Briggs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

POSTMASTERS' COMMISSIONS.

Mr. RAMSEY. With the consent of the Senator from Michigan I ask the Senate to consider a small House bill, simply providing that hereafter the Postmaster-General shall issue commissions to the postmasters appointed by the President. They are now issued by the Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The bill provides that hereafter the commissions of all postmasters appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made out and recorded in the Post-Office Department, and shall be under the seal of that Department, and countersigned by the Postmaster-General, any laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the object of that?

Mr. RAMSEY. These commissions have been issued by the State Department, and the President in his message and the Postmaster-General suggest that the duty had better be transferred to the Post-Office Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 921) to prevent the useless slaughter of buffaloes within the Territories of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for the apportionment of the Territory of Wyoming for legislative purposes.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes."

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I said on the first week of the session that "lack of currency was primarily the cause of the derangement, and want of elasticity, a second incident, intensified the panic. To remedy this recurrence for the future, the resolution proposes that banking shall be open and free to all, individuals and associations, without limitation of capital."

By a small majority the proposition of free banking under the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] was, on the 19th of last month, rejected. A few Senators, and enough to have carried the amendment, were fearful that free banking would work too easy, and, it might be, too great expansion, and preferred a limitation to the volume of currency by statute. The law of supply and demand, they thought, would not be as wise as the law of metes and bounds. They could safely vote for a definite amount of expansion, but could not as prudently support a measure which would break the monopoly of circulation into a volume regulated by flexible wants under universal privilege. I confess, Mr. President, that I did not share the apprehensions of excessive expansion under a free system of banking as much as I deprecate the continuance of a financial monopoly which holds in its narrow grasp the monetary possibilities of over forty millions of people.

To extend the present enjoyment of the privilege of banking by the few, to the many, comports with the spirit of our institutions, and, like air, light, and water, broadens into a common possession.

The Constitution vests the power to create money or emit bills of credit, and the regulation of the value, in Congress—the sovereign legislative will of the whole people. This was well enforced by President Buchanan in his message of 1857, as follows:

> "It is one of the highest duties of government to insure the people a sound circulating medium; the amount of which ought to be adapted, with the utmost possible wisdom and skill, to the wants of internal trade and foreign exchange."

To commit this trust and privilege to a small minority, while it is denied to the great majority, is not a just exercise of representative power. If its benefits are substantial to the few, they are equally essential to the many; the greatest good to the greatest number is the highest achievement of statesmanship. It is predicated upon the welfare of the State. The good of the whole assures the best interest of the parts, and the minority, in finances as in politics, should be governed by the will of the majority.

Adequate currency gives activity to labor and profit to industry. The Government has taken from the States the power to supply the country with currency, and is therefore bound to provide an ample volume for its business needs. It owes the people the right to issue their own credit without interest, in the form of money, to meet this want.

The advocates of resumption have assumed a personality for the Government distinct and apart from the people, to mystify the issue.

The Government is simply the agency of the people, charged to do their will, and for their financial necessities to put in the form of money the people's promises to pay. It is for their necessity and is their own expedient. In money of their own creation, stamped with the seal of their own Government, and made a lien on the whole national wealth, they have perfect faith, and ask for no other and want no better circulation.

A free-banking system for the country is a great step in the right direction. It is anti-monopoly and in the interest of the whole people. It is a stimulus to national industry, and tends directly toward the more rapid national development. Restricted, as now, it becomes an object of prejudicial distrust; made free to all, it works into the favor and faith of all. Currency in some form is indispensable to the industrial necessities of the nation. Without a proper medium of exchange the growth of the country and the accumulation of wealth would be arrested. All nations have found it necessary to make up the volume of circulation through paper money. The distinguished statesman of South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) said in 1839 of this necessity:

> "It is, then, my impression that in the present condition of the world a paper currency in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities.
> "The famous statesman of Virginia (Mr. Jefferson) implied the character of the paper issue in writing, 'Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulation restored to the nation to whom it belongs.'"

The necessities of our late war made it imperative to give emphasis to this as never before in the annals of the nation. From the transition from State-bank issue to Government and national-bank issues, the nation settled into two forms of currency as best adapted to the necessities of war, and they have proven beneficial for the country in a state of peace.

Based upon the credit of the whole wealth of the nation, its stable value has in war and peace been well measured by the people. In the midst of the recent financial panic it stood the test of such a revulsion, and proved to be the most reliable currency the nation has ever used. One form of national issue would, in my judgment, be another advancing step in the perfection of our monetary system. The whole currency of the nation would then wear one face and value; made lawful money for all purposes, there would be no national discredit stamped upon it, and it would become the equivalent of gold; issued by the people, authenticated by their government, bearing the national honor, and the people held to pay, they would have full faith to use; for it would be the people's money, and bearing their own measure and seal of value. It would become as stable as the stability of the Republic.

I am strengthened in this view by the reply to my question during the delivery of the able speech of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance. The question and answer were as follows:

> "Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask whether, in the Senator's judgment, the value of the currency in France depends so much on the convertibility of the notes into bonds, or on their being made lawful money for all purposes, which our greenbacks are not?
> "Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that it would greatly advance our greenbacks if they were allowed to be received at the custom-houses for duties."

France has a circulation of seven hundred millions of currency, made lawful money for customs as well as all other public and private dues, and it stands at a discount of only ½ per cent., and under specie suspension at that. May I remind the honorable chairman also of the part he took in the debate and passage in the Senate, in 1862, of the amendment of the Committee on Finance making Treasury notes a legal tender for customs and all public and private debts except interest upon bonds and notes? By reference to the Globe, second session Thirty-seventh Congress, part 1, page 789, it will be seen that the chairman then, Mr. Fessenden, was against it, but the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] favored it, saying:

> "I do believe there is a pressing necessity that these demand notes should be made a legal tender if we want to avoid the evils of a depreciated, dishonored paper currency."

Contended for then, why cause the depreciation of greenbacks now by denying the remedy? While holding to this belief, I am not so wedded to choice, nor so presumptive, as to discard any advance in the right direction because the whole is not reached at one step. With substantially one-half of our circulation a Government issue, and a legal tender for nearly all purposes, the freeing the remainder from the objectionable character of a monopoly, and thus diffusing it into the people's privilege and possession, the two would substantially run parallel in commercial channels, and compete for public favor. A fair opportunity would then be given for the practical test of relative merits. Time would sooner or later elect which answers best the purposes of money, and practice settle all questions of theory. Both freely issuable and both as generally in circulation, the people could best determine how long it would be well to suffer the burden of an annual payment of many millions of coin interest on the bonds underlying the national currency as the boon for national denial of lawful money to this form of the volume of circulation. Whenever they should have sufficiently endured the grievance of this annual draft upon their industrial resources as to ask that all of the currency be made issuable by the Government, as the legal-tenders or greenbacks now are, the further step would inevitably follow that the Government should not refuse to receive its own issue for customs dues, nor longer so discredit its money, but rise to the full measure of credit by declaring national faith by full national use of the authorized money of the land. When such an overwhelming blow shall be enacted against the traffic in gold, kept up through thousands of merchants compelled as now to barter for coin to pay their customs, when the Government could, without competition, secure its needed coin itself to meet all its obligations, it will be a wise as well as an economic reflection, worthy of congratulation, that the national medium of circulation ceases to wear the national discredit which kept it so long from becoming equivalent to coin.

Were we there now there would be no need of the labored efforts to enact the convertibility of our currency into interest-bearing bonds, and to that extent swell the public debt; nor the necessity for futile attempts to work through commercial ruin a resumption of specie payment, for resumption would then be reached by the costless and natural union of coin and currency into equivalent value. Together, then, they would serve the national purposes. Gold as the standard, and currency the full measure, of value, both would then join and become the medium of exchanges.

Prominent financiers have foreshadowed as much. McCulloch wrote that—

"If there were perfect security that the power of issuing paper money would not be abused—that is, if there were perfect security for its being issued in such quantities as to preserve its value relatively to the mass of circulating commodities nearly equal—the precious metals might be entirely dispensed with."

So Macleod, in his Theory and Practice of Banking, wrote:

"The simplest and most perfect form of a currency is that which represents nothing but transferable debt, and of which the material is of no intrinsic value, such as paper. It is only when States have reached a high degree of civilization that they adopt this perfect form; before they attain that the material of it entirely consists of something which has an intrinsic value, such as gold or silver."

From many minds of experience it might further be shown that security is the essential element of any form of money.

I here, for the present, dismiss this financial desideratum of a perfect paper money for a future occasion, and for the people to press, trusting that time will prove the healer of all monetary ills.

The alternative now stands before us of expansion in some form or resumption; commercial life or commercial death; either diffusion of wealth, or monopoly of wealth. The question involves the prosperity of the producer, else the enrichment of the non-producer; whether the laborer shall walk more erect, or the capitalist more proudly strut.

Mr. Calhoun stated it thus:

"The subtle and artful contrivances of modern times have been substituted for the brute force and gross superstition of ancient, as a means of allotting so small a share of the wealth of civilized communities to those by whose labor it was produced, and so large a share to the non-producing class."

The distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] in the debate on the 22d day of January last, put the issue as between the borrower and lender in this wise:

"As was said, I believe, by a Senator, about another subject entirely, there is an absolutely irrepressible conflict, therefore, between the people who wish to borrow and use other men's money and the people who have the money themselves."

Mr. President, the vote upon the pending question will announce upon which side of these "contrivances" or this "conflict" Senators choose to array themselves.

Under free banking there would be freedom and profit to industry. Restricted banking is monopoly of riches and crippled industry. A system of free banking tends to equality of circulation; monopoly of banking creates inequality. One is republican, the other is anti-republican. One erects an aristocracy, while the other dethrones it.

Expansion, or free banking, involves no more increase of our national bonds. Resumption looks to the issue of more of the national bonds and the expansion of our public debt.

Throughout this whole debate I have looked in vain to the advocates of resumption for some plan of substantial relief, but they all weld their theories to more national bonds. They offset what they term "inflated currency" with inflated bonds. Recognizing the fact that we have so little coin in the country, that resumption is practically an impossibility, still their plan for resumption is to issue more bonds, and by their sale provide coin for resumption, which involves simply the process of issuing bonds as fast as the currency is presented for redemption—an automatic system of perpetual exhaustion. As fast as bonds are sold, and the coin exhausted by redemption, more bonds and more coin must answer more demands for redemption. The flow into the Treasury would be currency, and the outflow would be coin, till it would be found that the consequent contraction of the volume of currency, through redemption, would be replaced by the interest-bearing bonds of the Government.

There is a difference in method of exchange among the advocates of resumption. Some would resume direct by coin resumption, and others propose to resume indirectly by conversion into bonds. One method makes the Government sell its bonds and hand over the coin to the bill-holder, and the other method is to hand to the bill-holder bonds and let him wait for his coin.

It is an ingenious scheme, for it withholds notice of the inevitable effect such conversion would have upon our bonds. As bonds are not gold, but promises to pay gold at some definite time, they are no nearer gold than currency promises to pay gold at some indefinite period; all the difference being that one bears interest and the other does not. Whatever the currency is appreciated by conversion, in like measure depreciates the bonds; so that the national bonds suffer what the national currency gains. Both stand alike pledged by the same total wealth of the nation. If expansion of currency depreciates it, upon like principle expansion of bonds depreciates them. Contraction of the currency adds no more value to the remainder, as long as the amount contracted reappears in an equal increase of bonds, for the national indebtedness is not lessened. By the interest involved on the bonds the obligations to pay are increased, and diminish value rather. Change of form is not lessening of obligation, and cannot be an increase of value. If a man owes $100,000 in notes, and changes them into obligations to pay lands, houses, and horses, aggregating the same value, his credit is not strengthened, for he still owes $100,000 in property, and his financial standing is measured by his debt in either case. So the Government buying gold with its bonds, the nation owes for its bonds. No financiers have ever yet discovered a way by which a person or people can borrow out of debt. If the advocates of contraction can show us how to do this, I shall come to their aid as the easier method, by far, of relieving the people of financial embarrassments.

That I do not misapprehend the dilemma, I give it as the debate has impressed the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] whose subtile satire is often wielded with pungent effect in the exposure of sophistry. Impliedly against any great expansion of currency and seeking for some feasible way to effect resumption, he comments in this wise in his remarks on the 15th of last month:

"The Committee on Finance does not seem to be entirely agreed what should be done, and I believe the country is not quite harmonious on that question. If I understand the proposition of the chairman of the committee, he recommends that we now set our faces toward the resumption of specie payments and that we achieve that end within a given time. If I understand the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] he recommends to us that we achieve it at once. If I understand the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] he would recommend to us to resume specie payments when the printing of national notes shall be numbered among the lost arts.

"Mr. President, if I know that my neck is sure to be broken, it has always been an open question with me whether I would rather have it done to-morrow or next year; and so I should hesitate to choose between these recommendations of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Delaware, for I should feel very certain that broken necks were to be the result. This country is doing business on a scaffold a great way up from solid ground. You are sustained there by a statute. Repeal it, and down you come. Undertake to resume specie payments now or next year, undertake to convert your whole volume of paper into specie now or next year, and I think disaster would be the inevitable result. I am so sure of that, that rather than agree to either of those expedients I think I should join the Senator from Michigan and go up in his balloon and not come down at all."

Puzzled, then, it would seem, as to what was best to do, the honorable Senator wisely chooses to avoid falling from grace by looking upward for salvation. Faithful as he always is to the logic of his convictions, he has seen no practical way of escape from industrial and financial embarrassments, except through expansion, which he approves and has supported.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] late at the head of the Treasury of the United States, where his opportunity and discrimination have afforded him acquaintance with the intricacies and movements of finance, brings to such rare observation the ability for which he has just fame, and has favored the country with views presented with force. With all of his ability, however, his position seems anomalous, and in my judgment untenable. He proposes the perilous voyage between Scylla and Charybdis.

I cannot better state his policy of neutrality than to quote his words:

"Thus, Mr. President, I have presented the considerations which influence me to do what I can to hold the Government of the country to its present policy, believing that a forcible contraction of the currency will end in disaster, believing also that the expansion of the currency, however it may be effected, will lead to the evils which we have experienced temporarily during the last autumn and which are the necessary result of every local expansion of a currency, whether it be of paper or of coin. The Senator from Missouri, I think, must bear witness to the fact that the accumulation of coin in Germany has compelled the government to be constantly on the alert to prevent the evil results of inflation."

While such a policy might have been pursued without detriment when the business of the country was prosecuted with its usual activity, under no commercial disturbance; albeit during a period of stagnation, following a commercial panic, with confidence shaken in financial circles, such a course of inaction must, upon principles of common experience, entail greater prostration and cumulative disaster. With commercial paralysis fallen upon the country, the suggestion of no relief must be fraught with greater fatality to industrial interests. The annals of the country furnish conspicuous instances of the fallacy and peril of the theory of general apathy. It came near fatal illustration under a Chief Magistrate who officially pronounced against the right of disunion, and at the same time denied the power to prevent disunion. Such policy the people repudiated.

Later still, when this neutral doctrine was being antagonized at arms, an illustrious general, famous for his skill in organizing victory, surpassed it only by his masterly inactivity in postponing victories, and this, too, the people rejected, under another leadership, whose pertinacious activity crowned successive victories with final triumph.

The honorable Senator from Ohio, I mean, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator [Mr. THURMAN] who very laudably aspires to make the fourth estate of democracy the first estate of the Republic, has, during the two months the subject of finance has been before the Senate, maintained remarkable reticence. Were it not that the columns of the Globe and RECORD of senatorial proceedings stamp him the ready and elaborate debater of every subject within the range of human knowledge, this unusual silence would not have been so noticeable. Not till the 17th of last month did he take part in this debate, and opened thus:

"Mr. President, I have not said a word on this great subject, and if the Senate is not impatient to adjourn at this hour I should like to occupy about fifteen minutes."

Purposely, it seems, did he step out of his way to throw ridicule upon one side of a grave subject.

Adding, also:

"I take my full share of the responsibility for talking on other matters. On this, fortunately for me, I have perfectly clean skirts."

How fortunate! The distinguished Senator has very recently been rehonored by his State to another term in the United States Senate. Upon what, with other assurances, as understood by the democracy of Ohio?

Let me read a paragraph from a recent number of the Cincinnati Enquirer, wherein, in answer to the remark that it would "be glad to hear of Senator THURMAN redeeming the promise he made during our late canvass," it puts its grievance in these words:

"Last fall when the panic began Senator THURMAN justly characterized it in his speeches as the result of an effort on the part of the creditor East to force the debtor South and West into a violent resumption of specie payment, by which the debt of $100 would really cost the debtor $150. Senator THURMAN went further, and declared if God would give him strength to reach Washington his voice would be heard resisting this effort on the part of eastern capitalists, which, if successful, would end in wide-spread financial ruin. This contest has now been going on for over two months, and our distinguished friend has made no sign."

Verily, "made no sign," except to advocate recommittal of the subject without instructions to a committee already announced by resolution to be in favor of resumption.

Waiving comments upon the honorable Senator's vote not appearing in favor of the Cameron amendment to make the banking monopoly free to all; nor for like object and convertibility of Treasury notes into low-interest bonds under the Gordon amendment; nor in favor of reconsidering the vote that carried the Cooper instructions to the committee to report a bill providing for the convertibility of Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States; neither in favor of the Merrimon amendment to increase the currency forty-six millions; searching in vain for his votes on these important questions, the honorable Senator's pent-up views and votes finally break out in a satirical descent upon a substitute "offered by the Senator from Michigan," [Mr. FERRY,] because it proposes practical measures to "give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium." The honorable Senator derides it in different ways, one of which is in this wise:

"If it was made out of India-rubber it would not be stable. It is to be stable, that is, to be fixed; and it is to be elastic, that is, it is not to be fixed."

The honorable Senator, it seems, could not forego derision lest some one might readily comprehend that a currency could be stable in value and elastic in volume. Nor did it occur to me, when I drew up the text of my amendment, but was discovered when the Senator spoke, that I had presumed somewhat upon the fairness of commentators.

The upshot of the distinguished Senator's criticism and sense of duty is in his own closing paragraph, thus:

"I shall therefore vote to refer back the whole subject, whenever I can get the opportunity to do it, to that committee, and without any instructions whatever."

The Senator has voted nothing, and proposes to do nothing. I submit such apathy to the commentary of history, solemnized by the lips of divine judgment, and hoary with the lapse of ages, in the admonishing words:

"I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth."

Invoking this utterance of the past upon a proposed policy of apathy, affecting the financial and industrial arteries of the nation, it would not be at all strange if ere long public necessity retort, and spew such policy out of the nation's mouth.

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] in his carefully elaborated speech delivered a few days since, summoned his rhetorical powers to cast contempt upon the currency of the country and to charge disgrace for its issue upon the American name. That I do not mistake the honorable Senator, I quote his words:

"Mr. SCHURZ. There are other persons, I fear, who are depreciating the credit of the country. They are those who want to continue a money system which introduces into all transactions of business the element of chance and deception; a money system which by that deception injures not only the foreigner who may invest his funds here, but our own people; a system of irredeemable paper money which has time and again fallen under the contempt of civilized mankind. Those, I say, are depreciating the credit of the country who in the very midst of the nineteenth century, with all the lights of universal experience around them, still strive to maintain, to confirm, and to perpetuate a disgrace like that. I tell the Senator from Pennsylvania I can think of nothing that would be better calculated to elevate the American character and to raise the credit of the country in the eyes of the world than a speedy deliverance from that system."

He declares our currency to be "a system of irredeemable paper money which has time and again fallen under the contempt of civilized mankind." When and where, pray? Was it in the quick response from Europe to the first gun fired on Sumter, that "the American bubble has burst?" The Republic had not then founded its money upon the credit of the nation. The knowledge that its bonds were 12 per cent. below par at the close of President Buchanan's administration, with the Treasury bankrupt, and the assumption that we had no resource but foreign aid, European speculation upon our existence as a Republic was as groundless an estimate placed upon our circumstances and resources as the honorable Senator's value put upon the character of our currency. The American Republic then received, we know, the expressed contempt of Europe. But when the honorable Senator declaims that our paper money has fallen time and again under the "contempt of civilized mankind," I must say, for his recollection and for the rest of mankind, that this new system of United States paper money clothed, equipped, fed, and paid an army of citizen soldiery who carried successfully through an unprecedented war at home, in the face of hostile sympathy and aid abroad; sweeping away in the track of battle the cruel apple of domestic discord, and reuniting a discordant people; that it indispensably assisted in rehabilitating broken sections, and in raising the nation to the rank of a first power; that it so improved our fallen credit that the bonds of the Republic standing as low as 36 in gold in July, 1864, have so risen in value that foreign capitalists seek them with avidity at above par in gold. That with its aid hundreds of millions of public indebtedness have been paid during years of prosperity since the war, and under which the nation grew in material wealth as never before. All these achievements essentially gained through the instrumentality of a currency based upon the credit of the whole nation, and yet it is characterized as a "disgrace" to the nation. With its aid and trial, as the best expedient we could devise, it has extorted from the Senator himself, elsewhere, comments which should free it from the category of disgraceful or valueless agencies.

The honorable Senator was pleased to speak, in other connection, of the national-bank bills in this wise:

"They are, moreover, founded on the secure basis of Government bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold. Their circulation is, therefore, not local, but national in the widest sense of the term, just like that of greenbacks. They are just as safe, and in one sense they are even more so, for they have behind them the solid foundation of a United States bond, payable in gold, and at the same time the ability to pay of the bank that issues them. * * * The breaking of the bank that issued it does not injure its value in the least."

Now I ask, after such an indorsement of the character of our currency, and with the known fact that no nation has ever before established a paper money system based upon such aggregated wealth, and that though new, its trial has proven it to be more secure and reliable than any other banking system the world has ever witnessed; I repeat, is it fair, is it just to the American people, or creditable to the candor of the honorable Senator, to attempt to disparage such a system by coupling it with Marco Polo's story of China's currency, centuries ago?

I read a paragraph from the honorable Senator's quotation from Marco Polo's Travels, taken from his speech, as follows:

"All of these pieces of paper are issued with as much solemnity and authority as if they were of pure gold or silver; and on every piece a variety of officials, whose duty it is, have to write their names and to put their seals. And when all is prepared duly, the chief officer deputed by the Kaan smears the seal intrusted to him with vermilion, and impresses it on the paper, so that the form of the seal remains stamped upon it in red; the money is then authentic. Any one forging it would be punished with death. And the Kaan causes every year to be made such a vast quantity of this money, which costs him nothing, that it must equal in amount all the treasure in the world."

It will be remembered that this Chinese currency was made in vast quantities, and each issue cost the Kaan nothing, and is, in amount, equal to "all the treasure in the world." And further on the Senator states that new issues were made to take up old, by an exchange of one new for five old. Then the honorable Senator cites a Persian monarch of the thirteenth century, who "imitated a similar system, which produced great distress." He also cites the Scotch financier, Law, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, who "carried it to the full extent of progressiveness." Next, he names the French assignats; and these, he says, "were pieces of paper money, enough to cover all the land, and to wrap up all the articles bought and sold." Finally, he quotes the continental money, issued without limit, and without any national credit.

These, Mr. President, are samples of the parallels drawn to disgrace our national currency; a currency necessarily limited—based upon the total wealth of the nation, whose bonds are above par in coin in the markets of the world.

No one questions the ingenuity of the Senator to cite convenient precedents upon which to rear argument and reach conclusions which are, in his judgment, the overthrow of the theory he combats; and I give these as a sample of his researches.

Let me give another instance. The honorable Senator is striving to show the disastrous effects of paper money upon consumers.

I ask the Secretary to read his words, which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Let us see how it works. The importer or the wholesale merchant in New York, when putting up his goods for sale, will first add to the gold price the premium on gold. That is universally conceded. But he knows that the premium on gold or the discount on the currency fluctuates, and that if it be inflated it will certainly depreciate. If he sells on credit, however short that credit may be, he runs this risk: that the sum he receives in paper money for his goods will not represent the same gold value which the same sum represented at the time when the sale was made; and here an important element comes into the calculation of prices, which has been left out by all the Senators who, taking the opposite view, have discussed this subject. It is the element of risk. The importer, or the manufacturer, or the wholesale dealer, must protect himself against the contingency of fluctuation; and thus he puts upon the price of his goods a certain percentage to cover that contingency. In other words, he makes his customers pay for the gambling risk which he himself has to run. The jobber who buys from the importer or the manufacturer has to put his gambling risk upon the price again, for he runs the same chance. The western or southern wholesale dealer who buys from the jobber has to do the same thing once more, for he again runs the same chance. Then the western or southern retailer, into whose hands the goods finally pass, has to do the same thing again, if he sells on credit, for he again runs the same chance. Thus two, three, or four gambling risks are put upon the price of an article before the commodity, as it issues from the hands of the original seller, passes into the hands of the consumer; and thus the rise in the price of commodities goes far beyond the premium on gold, especially when the fluctuations of the currency, as inflation will always make them, are tending in the way of depreciation.

"Now go to New York, and every candid merchant will tell you the same story. I know of merchants in New York who actually changed the prices of their commodities during the violent fluctuations of the currency six times in one week; and one told me himself that he had done so several times in one day, always lowering or raising the gambling risk he had put upon the price of his commodities as circumstances changed. And experience teaches us that merchants are apt to be very quick in putting up prices and very slow in putting them down.

"Hence it is clear that, while the farmer or planter gets for his product only the gold price, with the gold premium added at the place of sale, he must pay for all he has to buy the gold price, with the premium added, and an additional amount covering the gambling risks of three or four dealers through whose hands the purchased articles must pass before they reach him, and that additional amount covering the gambling risk will naturally grow very much higher when the currency is inflated and in process of depreciation. The conclusion is inevitable that in this point of view, the correctness of which cannot be questioned, an irredeemable fluctuating currency cannot be anything else but a curse to the agricultural interest, a curse the more oppressive as inflation goes on; and the more inflation there is, the more the farmer will lose in buying in proportion to the prices at which he has to sell."

Mr. President, let us analyze this. The importer in New York adds to his gold price the premium on gold. The Senator adds to this a speculative risk price, to cover the possible fluctuations of currency till the maturity of the buyer's note. Call this risk, for illustration, 5 per cent. Next the jobber adds his risk "contingency of 5 per cent.;" for "he runs the same chance." Then the western or southern wholesale dealer, who buys from the jobber, has to do the same thing, adding 5 per cent. more; lastly, the western or southern retailer, "into whose hands the goods finally pass, has to do the same thing again," making 5 per cent. more; and the Senator concludes:

"Thus, two, three, or four gambling risks are put upon the price of an article before the commodity, as it issues from the hands of the original seller, passes into the hands of the consumer."

Here then, according to the Senator, we have four risk prices; and say, for illustration, 5 per cent. each, put upon the importer's gold price, and gold premium added. This would be 20 per cent. above the actual currency price of the importer, and solely to meet a speculative contingency. Suppose such an extraordinary thing should happen as a depreciation of our currency of 20 per cent., between the day of the importer's sale in New York and the consumer's purchase at the West or South. The western farmer's or southern planter's wheat or cotton, or other commodities, would, of course, correspondingly rise in price. The honorable Senator concedes this in saying:

"The farmer or planter gets for his product only the gold price, with the gold premium added, at the place of sale."

If, then, the premium on gold, or, which is the same, the depreciation of currency, has been 20 per cent. meanwhile, he gets it for what he has to sell, and can pay it for what he has to buy. But suppose, as the case would really be, that the currency had not materially depreciated by moderate expansion, and the farmer or planter found 20 per cent. extra price put upon the wares he sought to purchase, he would demur to the exorbitant price. The merchant would tell him how it crept up, risk by risk, upon each sale from the importer to his purchase. But the farmer or planter would say there has been no such increase of premium on gold, and to prove it converts his currency into gold, at the rate it was when the importer sold; and offers the gold to the merchant for the goods he wants, with the 20 per cent. risk contingency price taken off, else he will not purchase, but send to first hands himself. This exposes the fallacy of the Senator's reasoning. In truth, the importer does add to the price of his goods the premium on gold, when his price then becomes a currency price, and no longer a gold one. He is made good for the exchange into currency; and all subsequent purchasers buy with currency, and at currency prices, and pay with the currency avails of currency prices of products.

This is one of the specimens of the honorable Senator's sophistry, palmed off under the attractive decoration of a master of rhetoric, without solidity, to meet the distressful facts and logic of a crippled condition of national finance.

Elsewhere the honorable Senator has declared in this same speech that volume of currency does not depend upon either area of country, population, productions or value, involved alone, but upon all combined. When, however, we show the United States to possess the most of these in combination, and with less circulation than other nations, thereupon some other basis is claimed.

In another part of his speech the honorable Senator argues that the quantity of coin in a country is the test of the proper amount of currency to meet the real requirements of legitimate business. I read his words:

"In the first speech that I made on this subject I stated a principle which furnishes a test. I said, assuming that the people have confidence in the Government issuing irredeemable currency, that currency will not necessarily depreciate or stand at a discount as to gold as long as it simply supersedes and does not exceed in volume the gold and silver, and the bank currency based upon gold and silver, which formerly sufficed to transact the business of that country; but the condition of confidence remaining the same, the irredeemable currency will depreciate, will be at a discount as to gold, as soon as its volume exceeds that quantity. When such depreciation steadily continues under the same conditions of confidence, it is a sure sign that the volume of currency is in excess of the real requirements of the legitimate business of the country."

When this is combated by experience and common sense, which teach that the reduction of the business of any commercial country to the sum of its coin would be ruinous, and that practically the total of coin is not the possible measure of volume of business, any more than it can be made the measure of volume of currency, the honorable Senator attempts to break the force of conviction by resort to his fund of illustration. Hear him from his speech, as follows:

"It has actually been asserted in this body that the precious metals can no longer remain the standard of value in any country. Why? Because the aggregate quantity and value of the precious metals in existence do not equal in value the aggregate amount of all the products of industry and agriculture; an idea just as original and as luminous as it would be to say that a yard-stick cannot remain a standard measure of length because a yard-stick is not as long as a roll of cloth or of carpet whose length is to be ascertained, or because all the existing yard-sticks in the world put together would not have the same length as all the objects whose length is to be measured."

If the Senator means by this illustration that yard-sticks represent coin and rolls of carpet the business of the world, the answer palpably is that, if there were but as many rolls of carpet in length equal to all the yard-sticks of the world, or could the total carpet await the measurement of the yard-sticks extant, the simile would be sound; but, unfortunately for his argument, and for the world, there are vastly more rolls of carpet than yard-sticks, and all the carpet presses for measurement at the same time. Here lies the difficulty with our own country, which has more "rolls" than "sticks," and which lack of supply the Senator is not for his country inclined to avow, but indirectly admits in his reference to some of the European powers. He said what I now read:

"We have heard it asserted that an irredeemable currency must be a good thing after all, because there are three countries in Europe—Austria, Russia, and Italy—whose economic development has been somewhat rapid of late, while those countries have an irredeemable paper currency. Nobody who knows anything about those countries can be ignorant of the fact that the sudden development referred to has been brought about by great and beneficent changes in their political and social organization, setting free and putting to work all the productive forces of society, and that the leading statesmen of those countries are day and night racking their brains to find means by which to get rid of that curse of an irredeemable paper money, which is here represented as the very source of prosperity."

Verily, Mr. President, it has been the incalculable services of our currency, and which the Senator seems determined not directly to admit, that has wonderfully been "setting free and putting to work all the productive forces of society" of this nation, as well, and which fortifies the advocates of expansion of this beneficent agency, to meet the demands for its good offices, so enriching the country with the rewards of its mission. The present bondage and inutility of dormant forces of society, painfully witnessed, intensify the zeal of the upholders of a medium which has shed blessings instead of curses upon the land. To restore the activity that sets to work the productive forces of society is the simple end sought by an adequate increase of the animating means.

It is the misfortune of our day, Mr. President, that, like those European states, so prosperous, we are afflicted with kindred statesmen who, as they, "are day and night racking their brains to find means by which to get rid of" what they please to term "the curse of an irredeemable paper money," but which the people value and bless as the "very source of their prosperity."

Hear from one of these statesmen racking his brain for solace tendered to the lacerated and impoverished South and West—one section suffering from its losses, the other from its contributions and enterprises.

The comfort tendered is in these words of the honorable Senator, [Mr. SCHURZ:]

"If they want to regain their former wealth they must adopt the same methods by which wealth is created elsewhere; they must produce more, much more than they spend, and they must carefully husband and gradually accumulate their surplus earnings. That is the way to create wealth and capital available for future production. It is a somewhat slow and painful process, but it is the only effective process that will be really effective. This applies more or less to the people of the whole country. This is a hard fact."

Truly a very "hard fact;" but not so hard as the unrelenting exaction of contraction and resumption, entailing more destruction of capital and more misery.

Increase of currency based upon the solid bonds of the Government is no watering "trick," but a valuable means of developing capital. Capital cannot create itself without the aid of somebody, or some agency, whose good offices of development aggregate into capital. The Government seeks to step in and perform this welcome trust, but the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] with his coadjutors, rather than give currency to such a Government medium, prefers to have the people suffer the "painful process" longer. It is, as he says, "slow but effective;" and adds, "this applies more or less to the people of the whole country."

To the people of the whole country, then, the rigid Senator replies, rather than longer suffer the "disgrace" of a currency which he has defined "as founded on the secure basis of Government bonds payable principal and interest in gold," specie resumption must be declared, though it prove a "painful process" and a "hard fact."

This is to deny the means of relief and pity the sad results! The nation will tell the honorable Senator to contract his tears, and instead, to expand the money. The honorable Senator further attempted to prove that prices under currency were more prejudical to the producer. If there is anything in "inflation," it must be general and applicable to all values; and the producer who was able to produce more than he consumed on a gold basis, must as well on a currency basis produce more than he consumes—the relation, of the income and outgo on the two bases, necessarily equals. His benefits are greater on a currency basis in this particular, his net gains are nominally larger, and such surplus increases in value in just the proportion that currency and gold approach to an equivalent, for the shrinkage is then his gain. But here is the honorable Senator's logic:

"The Senator from Massachusetts on my left [Mr. BOUTWELL] said that the influence of a depreciated currency does not raise general prices more than the amount of gold premium if the depreciation of the currency remains steady at the same point. But the difficulty is that the depreciation of the currency does not remain steady at the same point. You might just as well say that when we have a heavy fall of snow late in the winter or early in the spring there will be no freshets in the rivers, for if the snow does not melt it will not increase the volume of the water. That is perfectly correct; but the difficulty is that the snow will melt, just as an irredeemable and inflated currency will fluctuate and will depreciate."

All know that the fall or increase of snow of itself does not cause the freshet, any more than the increase of money causes its depreciation. Heat, rain, or like element, applied to the fallen snow, converts it into the freshet, just as the heat of distrust or kindred element of weakness, depreciates any commercial or financial exchange or value. Let the credit of the source of money be maintained, and any increase within the measure of undiminished credit, will work no depreciation of the value of such money, be it currency or of a different nature. In other words, other conditions being equal, an increase of volume causes no decline in the exchangeable value of currency.

An increase of our currency to the extent of forty-six millions, as proposed by the instructions to the committee, certainly no sane mind will contend, can weaken public confidence in the nation's ability eventually to redeem, and therefore cannot work a depreciation of the value of the currency dollar.

The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] did not materially differ as to the causes of depreciation of our currency when he said in another part of his speech—

"What are the causes which produce the disturbance of values through an irredeemable currency? There are two: first, lack of popular confidence in the issuer of that currency; and, secondly, the relation the quantity of the currency bears to the actual requirements of the business of the country. The first of these causes, the lack of confidence in the issuer, operated during the war, while the stability of our Government was still in question, and hence the fact that the fluctuations of the currency went far beyond the fluctuations that would have been caused by the relation of the quantity of the currency to the actual requirements of the business of the country. That cause, lack of confidence in the issuer, has not operated since the Government showed that it could maintain itself, and also demonstrated its ability to work in the direction of a redemption of its liabilities. But, sir—and I wish the Senate to mark this—that cause will commence to operate again as soon as the quantity of the currency has increased to such an extent as to render the ability or willingness of the Government, or of the banks ultimately, to redeem their promises in public opinion doubtful."

Admit this; is there to-day any lack of popular confidence in the issuer of that currency? The best answer is that during the panic, when people, if at any time, would doubt the value of their possessions, that currency was hoarded as carefully as gold.

To the second test, "the relation the quantity of the currency bears to the actual requirements of the business of the country," I may say that our greatest prosperity was when we had a greater volume of currency than we have to-day. Our national growth is in proportion to the development of our resources, and the volume of business bounds this development and consequent growth. Were it possible, under free banking, to induce all of the home and abroad holders of our outstanding $1,600,000,000 of bonds to deposit them with the Secretary of the Treasury and receive thereon $1,440,000,000 of currency, it would not equal the volume of various forms of circulation we had at the close of 1866, for we then had $1,571,787,780.

The direct reply may justly be to "the actual requirements of the business of the country"—the Senator's test—that no more currency for bonds would exchange than the business could make more profitable than the bonds, with equal safety; and this legitimate business demand would be no such implied increase of volume as could discredit the security of a currency whose value was every day enhanced by its immediate stimulus to national production and increased national wealth.

The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] had occasion some days since to criticise the statement I made, that the rate of interest upon money was regulated by the law of supply and demand—that a redundant circulation gave lower rates, and a stringent circulation caused higher rates of interest. He since admits the statement substantially in what I quote from his late speech. He said:

"The other day I received a letter from Omaha, in Nebraska, complaining very much that interest ranges there at 12 to 24 per cent., while in Boston and New York, as the letter stated, it ranged only from 6 to 8. That is undoubtedly true. In New York and Boston we can hear exactly the same complaint, that interest ranges there from 6 to 8 per cent., while in London and Amsterdam it ranges from two to three; and the reason of the difference between Omaha and Boston, and between Boston and Amsterdan, is exactly the same. In London and Amsterdam there are large accumulations of loanable capital; centuries have been spent in piling it up; larger accumulations of loanable capital than in New York and Boston. And in New York and Boston there are larger accumulations of loanable capital, also the growth of centuries, than in Omaha in Nebraska, or in Hannibal in Missouri. Now, if we could transport the accumulation of wealth existing in Amsterdam and London bodily to New York and Boston, then the rate of interest at the latter places would not be any longer 6 and 8 per cent., but it would be 2 to 3 per cent.; and if we could transport all the accumulated wealth of New York and Boston to Omaha and Hannibal, then, in all probability, the rate of interest there would cease to be 12 to 24 per cent., and it would range at 6 to 8."

Precisely this effect wherever the loanable money is in greater supply than the demand. Where the demand, as now, for loanable capital is greater than the supply, the necessities of debtors are at the mercy of creditors, and rates then fluctuate with the pressure of each case. When the supply is in excess of the active demands of business, debtors then share with creditors the stipulation of terms, and the rates are more moderate. If we are to wade through the sorrows and ruin of fortunes, with poverty broadcast over the land, in order to reach specie resumption, before the nation can begin to acquire the loanable capital to supply the demands of business, what capital remains, when specie is thus resumed, will be centered in the few and the business will have departed from the many. It would be a contraction of both business and capital, far worse for the country than all the gain of contraction of the currency for resumption can possibly be to those who are so clamorous for it. The profit to the few would be small compared to the great loss to the body of the people.

There are but two compulsory ways to resume. One is by an increase of the coin of the country, and the other by the decrease of the volume of currency; one involves more burdens of debt, the other more losses of fortune. I cannot assume the responsibility to advise either. There is a practical way to resume, encouraged by the progress made, the prosperity enjoyed, and wealth attained by the past years of national growth and gradual approach toward resumption since the war ended. England took twenty-six years of suspension, from 1797 to 1823, to relieve herself of her continental war. We have not yet taken half that time with a war of vaster magnitude. Why precipitate the natural approach to resumption? Why not yield the needed increase of means to restore and quicken the prosperity that advanced us toward resumption from 144, the price of gold when Lee surrendered, to 111, the price at the breaking out of the panic? It should constantly be kept in mind that among the essential achievements of this derided and worthless currency, the escape of this great nation from overthrow, stands as the living memorial of the service rendered to the American people and to the cause of civilization by this vilified, berated, and scouted national medium of exchange. The nation lives as the trophy of this denounced instrument, and will outlive all of its detractors or defamers, under whatever metaphor they may seek to enshrine themselves.

The irredeemability of the currency is the bane of the system, in the judgment of the Senator. What is his remedy? Not redemption in coin, for he admits the impossibility of redeeming seven hundred and fifty millions of notes with but forty millions of available coin in the Treasury, and but one hundred millions besides in the whole country. To redeem, the two must in one way or the other meet. The Senator would avail himself of the opportunity of the present prostration of business, by further impoverishment and misery, in order to reach the solution of our difficulties through specie resumption. He would break down more of the enterprises, prostrate more of our business men, throw more of the people out of employment, and carry desolation and starvation into more of the households of the land, that the finances of the nation may be brought to a specie standard.

It is in vain that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] late from the financial chair of the Administration, deprecates the ruin to follow any attempt to contract the currency to reach specie resumption. It matters little that financial minds of ripe experience protest against the fatal step of proximate resumption. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] demands, in behalf of foreign capitalists, an early return to specie payment, that the nation may no longer be disgraced by an irredeemable currency, nor foreign money seeking American investment longer be jeopardized. The honorable Senator, to further magnify the mortifying condition of the country, introduced as argument a letter from some foreign capitalist seeking the Senator's advice about the safety of American investment, which I read as the Senator gave it:

"A few days ago I received from a friend in Europe a most significant letter, to which an answer was requested. The writer is a merchant who desires to retire from business. He writes to me to this effect: 'I can realize out of my business several hundred thousand dollars, and should like to invest my money at a good rate of interest. I have thought of investing it in the United States on mortgage security, which, as I am informed, bears from 8 to 10 per cent.; but I learn also that you are likely to inflate the currency in the United States, which, of course, will result in depreciation. I would now ask whether it would be safe for me to make such an investment in mortgage loans in the United States while there is a chance that your legal-tender money may depreciate so that I would lose more by the depreciation of capital invested than I would gain by the interest I might get.'

* * * * * * *

"I shall tell that gentleman: 'Send your money here and tell all your friends to send theirs as soon as we enter upon a policy that will be directed toward specie payments,' for then I shall know that the value of the capital so invested will be safe; but I should not consider it honest advice, did I tell him to convert his gold into our paper money, as long as there is danger that the paper money might be depreciated by inflation."

This is his estimate of United States securities:

"If I were worth $10,000,000 and had it all to invest in loans, I would ask for no better security than mortgages on real estate in the United States. The question is this: whether a man investing a certain sum in mortgages, when he retires his capital two or three years hence, will not by the depreciation of the currency lose 20 or 30 or 40 per cent. of the value of his capital; whether the dollar that he invests now will be worth just as much when that dollar will be returned to him. That is the question."

Here it appears that a foreigner seeks American investment upon United States real estate security, which the Senator says is as good security as he wants. This is certainly a queer way to sustain the credit of one's country, to forecast a very improbable contingency of a depreciation of our currency, 20, 30, or 40 per cent.; to make out that a foreign friend may lose more by the depreciation of capital invested than he would gain by the interest he might get! Very singular contingency to cast against an adopted country! Any one conversant with the business of loaning on real estate, or with the negotiation of any permanent loan, knows well that the longer the loan has to run the more desirable it is to the capitalist. Frequent replacements are avoided. Foreigners understand this well, and always choose a longer running bond, at lower rate of interest, as the better investment. The Senator's foreign friend would doubtless stipulate for as long a loan as possible for his surplus capital.

The chances, judging from the past years, would be that our currency would then be nearer par than it now is; but if not, the foreign friend could as well reinvest his loan on such unquestioned security as real estate, until the currency became equal to coin and thus realize the extra profit of the premium he received for his gold when he made the first loan. In this scrupulous regard for the interest of a foreign capitalist it may not be out of place to remind the honorable Senator, if it escaped his notice, that while his foreign friends were taking our bonds at thirty-six cents and upward in coin—the value of currency then, in the throes of our struggle—and for which purchases we were thankful and showed our gratitude by paying them promptly at one hundred cents in gold, when many maintained they should be paid at their face in currency; it is worthy of his remembrance, I may say, that at the same time there were other German friends of ours who proved their loyalty to their adopted country by risking not only fortune but life, and such as survived the war, returned to their homes to find body and estate sadly shattered. They took their pay in currency, instead of gold. They have willingly and uncomplainingly suffered the loss of change of values. No murmur comes from them. They upheld the honor of the Government in the shock of battle. They have lost no faith in the nation in the trials of panic. They cheerfully meet, with other citizens of the United States, the fluctuations incident to any system in the natural course of business, for their faith has been tried and not found wanting in the nation, which has pledged itself for the integrity of its authorized money. These friends, I would remind the honorable Senator, have greater claims for his forbearance, to drive them to more losses by early resumption, in order to please a foreign friend and aid him to increase the profits of his loans.

Why not advise all his foreign friends to bring their coin here and hasten resumption without contraction? But he insists, not a dollar of investment here till a policy is adopted of resumption, but with it, they should come with hundreds of thousands of capital. Why, sir, if the honorable Senator's advice were so potent as to move such a mountain to Mahomet, the sum of his highest hopes—the return to specie payment—could at once be effected by the deportation of coin from Germany to America, and I beg of him in behalf of a country so "dishonored" with "irredeemable currency," to address himself at once to the herculean task of his eventful life. Such a solution would be the signal for a grateful people to pay homage to the masterly achievement.

In his great undertaking I would remind the Senator of two facts which may mitigate his distress.

German capitalists abroad hold largely of our national bonds. They have witnessed the funding of a part of them into lower rates of interest, maintaining meanwhile their value at par in coin. That they understand that our national currency is based upon these coin par value bonds, with but 90 per cent. of currency issued for each 100 per cent. of bonds, and the bonds pledged for the redemption of the currency; and as the highest evidence of this security and value, in the midst of a panic the people of the United States hoarded their currency, and cared not to exchange it for gold even at a small premium.

The other fact is that Europeans seem to understand their interests so well that they interpose obstacles to the transfer of coin to our borders. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] in his recent speech gave his experience while Secretary of the Treasury, and stated the fact that even the Geneva award of fifteen and a half millions of coin could not be transferred, but was adjusted by an exchange for our bonds in European markets; with the further statement that if necessary, foreign official interposition would follow any attempt to move coin in any substantial quantity from Europe to America.

Now, sir, in the face of these two facts to which I have called the Senator's attention, my answer to his foreign friend, questioning an investment in the United States, with United States bonds at par in coin and its currency based upon this pledge of the whole wealth of the nation; with Europe ingeniously and inflexibly withholding its coin from our vaults; and all this forcing a query and causing such a discredit of American security as to lead this foreign friend to hesitate about placing money here, my answer to him would be, hesitate forever. The credit, the faith, and the honor, of the United States are beyond question with the American people, and they are growing wiser than further to enrich other nations at the expense of their own. I tell the Senator that the tribute we are now paying for foreign faith costs this nation over one hundred millions of money annually, and the quicker we supply the people with adequate means to develop and husband their own resources, the greater will be our wealth and our credit and our independence. Europe wants us to check our enterprises and cripple our resources by forced resumption, for she is envious of our growth and jealous of our power. To make the New World tributary to the Old is the gist of the financial theories of the books. To make the New independent of the Old World is the financial problem of American aim.

The honorable Senator studies the books of the past, with the dim lamp of speculation; we open the volume of the present under the sunlight of experience. We revere the theories of olden time, just as we venerate the ages, but prefer business sense for a new era of finance, and choose to follow practical minds for the active necessities of the nineteenth century. The honorable Senator from Missouri, holding a seat in the Senate of the United States, denounces the money which the people have issued as a disgrace, and which the people cherish and value as no currency was ever valued before, and assumes from a European stand-point to shape a financial policy for the people who have so highly honored him. Not satisfied to deride and undervalue, in terms, the currency of the nation, he classifies it with the illimitable paper money of China, and the assignats of France, all without substantial security, while that of the United States is so valuable that the notes of any suspended bank are worth a premium of 5 per cent. for reissue under a new organization—the demand for banking currency to meet the unsupplied business wants causing this enhanced value. Not a dollar of any bank in liquidation since the national currency was issued but has borne a premium, I would remind the Senator. To cast further ridicule upon such a circulation, in the climax of his derision, the Senator exclaimed:

"Let every man issue his note for all his debts—past, present, and prospective—and then let us enact a law making that note legal tender."

Driven to such straits to advocate and fortify a policy of resumption, which prudent financiers unhesitatingly declare would be ruinous to the country, it is not strange that, to the appeal of prostrate industry suffering for more currency, the Senator should respond, by an increase of our bonds. Ruin of our industries is well understood to be an increased sale of foreign products, and more impoverishment of our people by such increased foreign indebtedness. To the demand for more money to save our industries, his answer is more foreign debt. Less paper money without interest, and more paper bonds with interest, is the financial policy of the astute Senator.

He tells the country that but one million of the twenty-five millions already issued of the greenback reserve has found its way out of New York and New England, and in the face of this inequality refuses to end the monopoly of banking by opening it to all.

Speculators, he adds, are the ones who ask for more money, and still he declines to break the power of those speculators, who hold in Wall street the lever of national disturbance, through the instrumentality of banking monopoly.

The honorable Senator has frequently quoted from the Chicago Tribune during this debate to fortify his stand against an increase of currency or free banking. In his late speech, however, to anticipate the force of a very recent editorial in that paper, favoring free banking, he had it read as a part of his speech, and garnished it with an ingenious application, which the editor will hardly thank him for, nor the public be cheated by the rhetorical disguise.

I may add, in passing, that while the Senator finds comfort and pleasure in berating and discrediting the circulation of the people's government and the people's money, he will have occasion to learn by suggestive experience that the people will not idly tolerate senatorial flourishes to brand the country with national dishonor.

The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] holding the distinguished position of head of the financial organ of the Senate, submitted his views some days since upon the monetary situation in a speech of remarkable ability. Charged as he is with the responsible duty of devising ways and means for the financial demands of the country, and bringing to his aid many years of thought and experience, he stands before the country as the exponent of a matured judgment upon questions of finance. Notwithstanding, the situation in which the country finds itself, extorts from the able Senator doubts upon the feasibility of any suggested plan for relief and stability. Regarded as the financial oracle of this body, his official utterances demand, and are given to invite, the broadest scrutiny.

Let me, therefore, quote from his speech, delivered January 16, 1874, on page 24, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Now, I have only to say, very briefly, that there are various modes, to none of which do I intend to commit myself until the whole subject is finally discussed, by which this can easily, without trouble, without difficulty, be accomplished. There are three modes that have been proposed in debate in the Senate, and a multitude come to us from the people, but I will group them into three classes.

"There is, first, the proposition to accumulate gold in the Treasury with a view to the actual redemption of our notes in coin. That is supported by two bills now before the committee; one introduced by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and the other by the Senator form New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] What are the objections to this plan? They seem to me to be these: In the first place any attempt to accumulate large masses of gold in the Treasury, lying idle to await some future event not fixed by act of Congress, would not be a wise use of the public moneys. In the next place, I entirely object to conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power of issuing one hundred millions or any lesser sum of 6 per cent. bonds with a view to buy gold to hoard in the Treasury to maintain resumption. I believe that it is impossible, in the very nature of things, to maintain the resumption of specie payments at all times and under all circumstances; and if anything has been established by modern experience, it is that all a nation can do that issues paper money is to maintain it at a specie standard in ordinary times; but, in times of panic, such as by periodical revulsions come over every country, specie payments cannot be maintained. They can scarcely be maintained in England, and are not now maintained in France, although they approach them. Therefore, every plan for specie payments ought to have some provision for the temporary suspension of specie payments, or some means by which in times of great panic and financial distress there may be a temporary departure from the specie standard. I say this not that it ought to be so, but simply as a matter of demonstrated experience shown by the history of almost all commercial nations of Europe.

"The second plan is the actual payment of the United States notes and their cancellation; in other words the plan of contraction. In the first place, this plan, while it operates, does so with such severity as, in a popular government like ours, to cause its suspension and repeal. Undoubtedly, the most certain way to produce specie payments is by retiring the notes that are dishonored, paying them off, taking them out of circulation. But the trouble is, the process of contraction is itself so severe upon the ordinary current business of the country that the people will not stand it; and in this country the people rule. The policy of Mr. McCulloch, already commented upon, if it had been continued further, would have undoubtedly brought us to a specie standard; but with great distress, great impoverishment, and with more difficulty than was really necessary to accomplish the object in view.

"These are the difficulties that occur to me as against these two policies.

"There is a third plan. This plan, which in my judgment presents the easiest and best mode of attaining specie payments, is by taking some bond of the United States which in ordinary times, by current events, is shown to be worth par in gold in the money markets of the world, where specie alone is the standard of value, and authorize the conversion of notes into that bond.

"I do not intend to consume much time upon the discussion of these different plans, because they are all open for debate, and I do not intend to commit myself."

Mr. President, the advocates of resumption are all driven to some expedient for gold to warrant any advance toward specie payment. The fact that the average annual product of gold of the country for the past five years has been but forty-two millions; that the excess of our exports over our imports of coin and bullion for the same time has been two hundred and seventy-five millions—an annual average of fifty-five millions—reducing the total gold in the land to one hundred and forty millions, and but forty-five millions of that available in the Treasury, as exhibited by the February statement of the public debt; with these facts, it is the sheerest folly for them to contend for practical resumption of seven hundred and fifty millions of currency with such a petty moiety as forty-five millions controllable by the Government, and the unavailable one hundred millions in works of art and other forms in the possession of the people. Worse than this. Our imports of merchandise and other industrial products, last fiscal year, were one hundred and sixteen millions in excess of our exports, and to supply an approximation of coin for what would be needed for an effective resumption, this balance, or whatever the balance might be against us, in foreign exchanges, must be included in the total of coin necessary to maintain specie resumption. None knows this better than the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance.

If resumption can be effected it must be by the people surrendering what coin they individually hold, and by a sale of bonds for gold to make up the requisite amount. How is the gold to be secured if the bonds can be sold? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] stated in the hearing of the honorable chairman that even the Geneva award of fifteen and a half millions could not be transferred to our shores, and that Europeans would either place obstacles in the way of a transfer of coin to America, or drive our bonds out of their markets. What alternative, then, is to be employed? If it be gradual accumulation of coin in the Government vaults, this seems injudicious in the judgment of the honorable chairman. He very wisely concluded, as he has stated, that not only would the "attempt to accumulate large masses of gold in the Treasury, lying idle to await some future event not fixed by act of Congress, not be a wise use of the public moneys," but, with equal clearness of conviction, stated the impossibility of maintaining specie payments at all times, enforcing this truth by the experience of foreign countries, when he says specie payments "can scarcely be maintained in England, and are not now maintained in France."

Notwithstanding all this, the honorable chairman lifts this impracticable theory of the gold dollar above the practical one of the currency dollar, for he declared in another paragraph of his speech that "we have rejected the true god (gold) and set up an idol (currency) of our own." Devoted as he is to that glittering image, he proposes, so far as he has expressed his preference, as the curative expedient, the conversion of currency into United States bonds. He proposes that the false god, currency, be transmuted into the motley god, bonds. How currency, consisting of 100 per cent. national credit is rejected as "false," and bonds composed of 100 per cent. national credit and 5 per cent. interest also in promise, is embraced as the "true god" is such a revelation of polemic divinity as surpasses all my ingenuity and comprehension. Let us for a moment consider how true and how false these respective measures of values are, and how great their claims to unchangeability, as their merit for devotion, are. The best form of a standard of value is perhaps put in the words of the honorable chairman in his speech, page 1, as follows:

"The most obvious of these axioms, which lies at the foundation of the argument I wish to make to-day, is that a specie standard is the best and the only true standard of all values, recognized as such by all civilized nations of our generation, and established as such by the experience of all commercial nations that have existed from the earliest period of recorded time." * * * * * *

And on page 5:

"Of late years much difficulty has grown out of the slightly varying value of silver and gold, as compared with each other, and the tendency of opinion has been to adopt gold alone as the standard of value. The United States has twice changed the relative value of these metals, and other modern nations have been driven to similar expedients. At the Paris monetary conference, held in 1867, which I had the honor to attend, the delegates of twenty nations represented agreed to recommend gold alone as the standard of value." * * * * * *

Then on page 27:

"Why, sir, this is not the first time we have changed the standard. We did it in 1835; and we have changed the value of our gold coin twice within my recollection. We have changed the value of silver two or three times. The monthly fluctuations that happen in the city of New York sometimes are greater than all the amount of difference between our paper money and gold now."

It will be borne in mind that this infallible gold-god was, in 1835, adulterated with alloy, and depreciated in value 6 per cent.

In the midst of the late panic—the very crucial test of our greenbacks—they stood but 6 per cent. below par in gold, precisely the percentage of depreciation in 1873; that was made in the gold standard in 1835.

The honorable chairman attempts a solution of the difficulty in what he says on page 5:

"The failure to distinguish between the standard of value and the medium of exchanges occasions many of the errors into which so many fall, and nearly every Senator who has spoken on one side of the question has fallen into this error."

That this clearness of discrimination between standard of value and medium of exchange may be made apparent by this assumed non-interchangeability of terms, let me read a paragraph from the distinguished Senator's speech made in 1862 when he was advocating the issue of the legal-tenders or greenbacks. I read from the Congressional Globe, second session, Thirty-seventh Congress, part 1, page 790. The Senator then said:

"Congress is not prohibited from emitting bills of credit or from making a standard of value, nor are these powers expressly conferred. Congress has repeatedly issued bills of credit; it has fixed gold and silver as the standard of value and made them a legal tender. Certainly gold and silver coin is the best standard of value, for it has inherent value in all commercial countries; but if in the course of events gold and silver cannot be had in quantities sufficient to form a medium of exchange for the increased wants of the country, then Congress may establish another medium of exchange—another standard of value. This was twice done by establishing a bank of the United States. I much prefer the credit of the United States, based, as it is, upon all the productions and property of the United States, to the issues of any corporation, however well guarded and managed."

Mr. President, the advocates of expansion, or free banking, and an increase of the volume of currency to meet the expanding wants of the people, stand now as the honorable Senator from Ohio—then also of the Committee on Finance—stood when he thus spoke; and we only seek, as he then sought, to "establish another medium of exchange, another standard of value."

In that same debate, in 1862, on page 763 of same volume, the very distinguished Senator from Maine, Mr. Fessenden, then the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, gave, in another form, his commentary on the instability of gold as a standard, in these sagacious words:

"Money in the market is always worth what it will sell for; it is an article of merchandise like everything else."

Taking these two eminent statesmen, SHERMAN and Fessenden, of 1862 as the standard, I had not departed far from financial orthodoxy when in my remarks on the fourth day of this session, while speaking on the subject of the conventionality of a monetary standard, I said:

"The idea that gold, as such, without Government authentication, is money is a figment. It has its value with other precious metals, and like silver, copper, iron, lead, cotton, and wheat, is a commodity, worth just what it will sell for in market. It can, no more than the other articles named, become a circulating medium, until made so by the nation using it. Its form, quality, and value as a currency must be approved and stamped upon it by the Government, before it becomes a medium of exchange. The monetary standard, whatever it be, is conventional."

May I not add the reasons given in Parliament, when the Bank of England suspended in 1797, upon the instability of coin as a standard? It was then said—

"That specie payments were of no benefit to England, as the specie when drawn from the bank went abroad. That it was better to stop specie payments while specie and bullion could be kept in the country by that means."

How could the wisdom of this, I ask, be advanced by the conversion of our currency into 5 per cent. coin interest-bearing bonds, and so establish a system of manipulation by which currency would run to the Treasury and there be transformed into bonds to float abroad and swell our public debt? We already pay annually over one hundred millions of coin interest on obligations now outstanding. This conversion system is to increase this large annual outlay of coin interest, and sooner or later draw on our resources further for the payment at maturity of these additional bonds. No, sir; it is the constitutional duty of the Government to supply a safe and ample medium of exchanges at the least possible cost to the people. In doing this in the form of currency without interest the Government is but emphasizing the advice of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN,] when he said in 1862:

"I much prefer the credit of the United States, based as it is upon all the productions and property of the United States."

If this could be said and urged with force in 1862, in the opening years of the war, and amid disaster to our arms and a creeping distrust over the certainty of our success, how much more sound and potent is it to-day, after complete triumph, and years of peace and prosperity!

Doubt then pervaded the financial circles at home and especially abroad, and our credit suffered in consequence. Faith now enters into all of the money centers of the globe, and the credit of the nation is beyond question. I do not overstate this, for the honorable chairman, [Mr. SHERMAN,] last December, as will appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 12th of that month, remarked that—

"Our credit is so good that we do not have to induce anybody, by any provisions of law, to buy our bonds."

With the admitted impossibility of resumption for lack of coin; with the declared necessity for use of currency as the national medium of exchanges, it logically follows that the needed volume for the business of the country should be supplied. This will be provided for by an increase, or under free banking, with the quantity properly regulated by the law of supply and demand. Based upon the nation's wealth and faith, and issuable only upon the unquestioned bonds of the Government, not a doubt can creep in to affect the credit of bonds or currency, and the expansion of circulation will run parallel with the expanding wants of the country.

That more currency is really needed is indirectly recognized by what the honorable chairman stated in his speech on page 29, while contending for his process of specie resumption. He said:

"Why, sir, I do honestly believe that if now there was a plan of redemption agreed upon by which notes could be converted into coin or bonds at the pleasure of the holder, all restrictions upon the amount of currency were repealed, the amount of currency thus at par with gold would be greater than it is at present, and its purchasing power would be just exactly 11 per cent. more."

If the amount of currency then, with all restrictions removed, would necessarily be greater to meet current demands of business, the same unanswerable demands plead to-day for the removal of restrictions to quantity, that the business necessities may be satisfied.

In this connection I may be permitted to refer to what I expressed in the first week of the session; and I read what I then said:

"In defiance of moderate expansion, United States notes have gradually worked up to nearly the value of gold. It is no just conclusion that a further moderate increase will widen the marketable space between the two. The fact of our experience is against such conclusion. Excess of currency did not cause the present depression in business. As long as business prospered, stimulated by enough circulation to supply the ordinary wants, currency and gold approached each other. When the business of the country outgrew the volume, stagnation followed, and the further appreciation of currency ceased. Were we on a gold basis this natural business demand for an increase would be met by our annual forty million coin product. Upon a currency basis this necessity and fact are ignored, and a reasonable increase denied. Over the ruin of industries and the prostration and pauperization of the people some would enforce contraction to effect resumption. Not even to restore the country to its condition before the panic would they yield to a judicious increase. Former prosperity gave us a natural and certain appreciation of our currency. They seek an unnatural precipitation, by contraction, to resume even at the expense of that prosperity. The let-alone policy is to let business stagnate and let the people suffer rather than depart a step from the kindred and more dangerous plea of contraction."

We are not without experience upon the policy of contraction, whether through the conversion of currency into 6 per cent. interest bonds or, by retiring gradually a portion of the circulation.

The three hundred millions of greenbacks issued under acts of February and July, 1862, were made convertible into 6 per cent. coin interest-bearing five-twenty bonds; and in the act of March, 1863, authorizing one hundred and fifty millions more, it was provided that the convertibility of the greenbacks into bonds should cease July 1, 1863. Thus convertibility was authorized, but allowed for about a year, and prohibited upon less than four months' notice to the holders, who now hold many of those notes bearing upon their reverse side the express promise of conversion, while the fact stands that that promise continues to be practically broken.

What has been our experience under the policy of direct contraction? This policy urged by the then Secretary of the Treasury, known as the McCulloch policy, was embodied in the act of April 12, 1866, directing that not more than ten millions of greenbacks should be retired within the six months following the act, and that thereafter not more than four millions in any one month should be retired. Gold at the date of this act stood at 128; the next month of May it had advanced to an average for the month, of 131, and continued to advance. February 4, 1868, an act was passed suspending further contraction when it was found that forty-four millions had been retired, leaving the volume of greenbacks in circulation three hundred and fifty-six millions, instead of four hundred millions, the volume outstanding April 12, 1866; and gold had risen fourteen cents, an advance under contraction, from 128 to 142.

Indirect contraction by conversion into 6 per cent. bonds, and direct contraction by retiring gradually the currency, having been after trial abandoned, and the policy of masterly inactivity declared perilous and ruinous, what alternative is there left but the wiser one of an adequate currency to give activity to labor, profit to industry, and prosperity throughout the country. Europe has pursued this judicious course by providing for its people circulation, whether of gold, currency, or both, a much larger per capita of its population than the United States.

From the Bureau of Statistics the following facts and estimates are drawn, showing the real, active circulation, on a gold basis, of the respective countries named. The bank reserves in each country, it will be observed, are deducted:

Countries.	Circulation.	Population.	Per capita.
Great Britain	$683,000,000	32,000,000	$21 34
France	1,509,000,000	36,000,000	41 91
Germany	704,000,000	39,400,000	17 87
United States	587,700,000	41,000,000	14 33

"Thus, placing the circulations of the several countries on a gold basis, which is necessary to a true comparison, we find that the amount in this country is $14.33 per head; in Germany $17.87; in Great Britain $21.34, and in France $41.91. Taking population into account, our circulation is about one-third that of France, two-thirds that of the United Kingdom, and four-fifths that of Germany."

Now let me give the per capita of the circulation of the United States since 1830—on a gold basis prior to 1862, and on a currency basis since.

Circulation per capita in 1830, and every year from 1836 up to the present date.

Year.	Circulation per capita.	Year.	Circulation per capita.
1830	$7 20	1855	$16 40
1836	14 00	1856	16 10
1837	14 00	1857	16 70
1838	12 50	1858	14 00
1839	13 40	1859	15 40
1840	11 20	1860	14 50
1841	10 79	1861	13 70
1842	8 00	1862	21 00
1843	6 90	1863	27 40
1844	9 10	1864	28 50
1845	9 40	1865	27 90
1846	9 90	1866	23 60
1847	10 70	1867	22 80
1848	10 10	1868	21 00
1849	10 50	1869	20 00
1850	12 20	1870	19 10
1851	14 20	1871	19 00
1852	14 50	1872	18 11
1853	14 80	1873	17 79
1854	15 80

This criterion has been disputed as being an arbitrary ratio, and in no way a legitimate basis upon which to adjust the circulation of any country. The honorable chairman so assumed when he said in his speech:

"Sir, area and population are not the things that demand currency; it is business, wealth, production."

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] negatively asserts as much when the obstacle in the way of adjusting a proper ratio is, as he stated, national poverty. His words were:

"The difficulty in the way of resumption can be expressed in one word which I have never yet had the courage in this connection to use. That word is poverty; not individual, but national poverty."

The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] disagrees with his distinguished supporters severally, but agrees with them combined. He said:

"But I ask what are the circumstances determining the volume of currency necessary for the real requirements of the business of a country? * * * It cannot be extent of territory alone. It cannot be population alone. I ask, then, is it the amount of productions, the number of exchanges, and of values involved? * * * * Neither of these elements alone, therefore, will determine the amount of currency which is necessary for the business of a country, but all of them combined will."

Answering these honorable Senators as to an adequate currency, fixed by the wealth, poverty, area, population, and production, or by all of them combined, I give the national growth, volume of circulation, ratio of circulation to wealth, for past years, as well as a table of population, and percentage of increase or decrease, for years obtainable from official sources; together with area in square miles; length of railroads and telegraph lines, in miles, of four of the great powers of the world, and let the public pronounce upon the relative inadequacy of our circulation by a just comparison.

In 1850 the real and personal wealth of the United States was $7,135,780,228; the volume of circulation was $203,800,000; the ratio of circulation to wealth as $1 to $35.

In 1860 the real and personal wealth of the United States was $16,150,616,668; the volume of circulation was $461,000,000; the ratio of circulation to wealth as $1 to $35.

In 1864 the real and personal wealth of the United States was $20,000,000,000; the volume of circulation was $750,000,000; the ratio of circulation to wealth as $1 to $27.

In 1870 the real and personal wealth of the United States was $30,068,518,507; with $859,000,000 as the volume of circulation, $1 to $35 would be the ratio of circulation to wealth—the ratio of 1850.

In 1870 the real and personal wealth of the United States was $30,068,518,507; with $1,111,000,000 as the volume of circulation, $1 to $27 would be the ratio of circulation to wealth—the ratio of 1864.

In 1874 the real and personal wealth of the United States is $35,000,000,000; with $1,000,000,000 as the volume of circulation, the ratio of circulation to wealth would be as $1 to $35—the ratio of 1850.

In 1874 the real and personal wealth of the United States is $35,000,000,000; with $1,296,000,000 as the volume of circulation, $1 to $27 would be the ratio of circulation to wealth—the ratio of 1864.

In 1874 the real and personal wealth of the United States is $35,000,000,000; we have $750,000,000 as the volume of circulation, which is but $1 to $47 as the ratio of circulation to wealth.

It is thus seen that on the basis of the ratio of circulation to wealth on a coin standard in 1850 and 1860, namely, that of $1 circulation to $35 of wealth, the volume of circulation in 1874, on a coin standard, should be $1,000,000,000; and as compared to the ratio of 1864, of $1 to $27 of wealth, the volume of circulation of the country in 1874 would be $1,296,000,000 of currency, instead of $750,000,000, the present volume.

I now submit a table of population and increase or decrease for respective years, being the latest comparison officially obtainable:

Countries.	Date.	Population.	Date.	Population.	Gain or loss.	Per cent.
Great Britain	1863	29, 800, 000	1871	31, 800, 000	Gain, 2, 000, 000	.7
France.....	1863	37, 380, 000	1872	36, 100, 000	Loss, 1, 280, 000	.35
Germany.....	1863	35, 430, 000	1871	41, 060, 000	Gain, 5, 630, 000	1. 6
United States....	1860	31, 443, 321	1870	38, 555, 983	Gain, 7, 112, 662	2. 3

Not to be unjust in this tabulated comparison of European countries in the percentage of gain or loss given here for a less number of years than a decade of the United States, I add the proportion to make up for the deficient years, and find Great Britain's increase of population for ten years to be $\frac{8}{10}$ per cent.; the loss of France $\frac{4}{10}$ per cent.; the gain of Germany nearly 2 per cent., while that of the United States is $2\frac{3}{10}$ per cent.

Let me now give a table of area, railroads, and telegraph lines, in miles, of the same countries, respectively for 1873:

Countries.	Area.	Railroads.	Telegraph lines.
	Sq. miles.	Miles.	Miles.
Great Britain.....	121, 111	15, 497	22, 000
France	204, 091	10, 954	26, 226
Germany	208, 619	13 095	22, 076
United States.....	3, 611, 844	71, 109	70, 511

With this relative extent of territory of the several countries, the vaster area of the United States in comparison is illustrated with significant force in the great system of railways and electric wires creeping apace with the development of the territorial and commercial demands of the nation. With 6,427 miles of road constructed in 1872, and 4,005 miles in 1873, in these two years building nearly as much as the whole railway system of France, and but little less than the whole of Germany, the financial wants of a nation like this find no adequate measure by the comparative needs of compact nations, covering less than one-eighteenth part the territory of the United States.

With such rapidly increasing wealth as the late census has revealed, and the constant increase of our population in far greater ratio than that of European nations; with the multiplied enterprises necessitated by such development, this growth must either be facilitated by sufficient means, or be dwarfed by a policy looking more to contraction, than to expansion, of the riches and prosperity of the nation. Every intelligent observer knows well that the broader the country the greater the time consumed in making exchanges, and of necessity the greater volume of circulation needed to carry on the same total of labor and business.

The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] expressed this when he said:

"But the same amount of production, the same number of exchanges, the same values involved, will require far less currency where there are superior facilities of rapid communication, of banking and clearing-house systems, than where they do not exist."

And further he said:

"Let us in this light compare England with the United States. In England, as well as in all European countries, the number of persons receiving salaries and wages is far greater in proportion than in the United States, and every one who is acquainted with those countries knows it. There are large armies there, large navies, which we have not. The number of private servants is much larger than here. The number of operatives and daily laborers is still greater. Now, although the population of the United Kingdom is only thirty-two millions, while ours is forty millions, yet the number of persons receiving salaries and wages is not only in proportion, but actually greater, much greater in England than here; and although wages rule higher here than they do there, yet I think I do not venture much when I say that the aggregate amount paid in wages and salaries in England is much larger than it is in the United States."

Mr. President, the avowal is here formally made by an honorable Senator, whose early days were spent in Europe, and who has the past season revisited the scenes of his nativity, confirming his earlier impressions by recent observation, by comparatively declaring the currency of his adopted country a disgrace to the American name, because it does not bear the sovereign character of European countries. He especially draws comparison between the United States and the United Kingdom of Great Britain.

His words are significant and invite apprehensive criticism. Let me repeat. He said:

"Now, although the population of the United Kingdom is only thirty-two millions, while ours is forty millions, yet the number of persons receiving salaries and wages is not only in proportion, but actually greater, much greater in England than here; and although wages rule higher here than they do there, yet I think I do not venture much when I say that the aggregate amount paid in wages and salaries in England is much larger than it is in the United States."

Then because more men are employed at lower wages there than here, but for the reason "that the aggregate amount paid in wages and salaries in England is much larger than it is in the United States," we must imitate England and Europe, and study her writers upon finance, and adopt her policy of industry and her system of monetary exchanges.

We know that wages are lower in Europe than in America. We know that more men are compelled there to work for low wages than are here employed. We know that that vast force of low-paid operatives are also the dependents of a formidable array of salaried dignitaries, and commercial princes, with titles of dukes, marquises, earls, counts, lords, and barons. We know that the feudal system, so long in vogue there, is the boon of aristocracy and the bane of the masses. We know that its policy is to make the rich, richer, and the poor, poorer. We know that around every merchant prince, moneyed aristocrat, and landed lord, cluster numberless tenants, serving the purposes of their exacting masters, like so many serfs doing the bidding of their unrelenting chiefs. That this mass of toilers are poorly paid and provided for by weekly, monthly, or yearly stipend, with no thought but work and pay, and the supply of both provided by the credit of employers, who are the financial centers of those laboring retinues, and use vastly less money than credit, is also well known.

Here in a free Republic: fewer men work for wages, and at great deal higher rates. Fewer live on salaries. The large majority of the people are their own operators. They think, devise, and arrange their own pursuits; dependent upon themselves and not upon others. They control and provide for no large dependent communities, and therefore have a restricted credit, and use more money daily, than credit. Such an enterprising and active people, made up of nearly as many centers of operation as there are men, educated to individual thought and action by the sovereignty of citizenship and the responsibilities of a free republic, with no one; from the President down to tide-waiter, wearing any other title but American gentleman, which nothing can dispossess but conduct of self-election:

To compare the wants of such an independent, industrial, intelligent, enterprising, well-paid, and inventive people, spreading over a still unoccupied extent, and developing resources of yet untold riches, with nations massed within unyielding boundaries, of limited resources, whose wealth is determined by the products of subsidized nations, and cheapened industry; whose people are divided between dependent toil and titled aristocracy—to make a comparison between two such peoples, for the purpose of fixing the character and volume of the money needed for one, thriving under republican freedom; by enforcing for such the nature and amount of money required by the other, moving under monarchical forms of limited powers and benefits, is such a reversal of the spirit and scope of modern progress as to evoke my unqualified repudiation. Europe's feudal system of "capital owning labor," bequeathed to America in the relic of industrial slavery, was, in a war of sections, effectually and forever disposed of in that form. The restored Union of the States has been constructed upon that grave. If that system is to reappear in the form of financial bondage, in another section, and the irrepressible conflict is to marshal the South and West against the East, let it come, for the issue will be as inevitable and emphatic, as the late contest, and upon the grave of this bondage, will be constructed the American system of, labor owning capital.

In Europe, with the facilities of compact nations—wherein commercial exchanges between extreme boundaries are made daily; where low wages and abundance of money cheapen all modes of travel and traffic and all means of living; where, by wise foresight and sagacious statesmanship, its money centers have become the clearing-houses of the world, and all the nations of the earth made tributary to European wealth—bills of credit of various forms are the greater share of the financial volume of its circulation.

The United States, with less money than muscle and more brains than capital; whose broad area requires thirty days instead of one to make its commercial exchanges between productive extremes; wherein high wages and scarcity of money enhance modes of travel and transit, and increase the cost of living; where, by following the theories of a past age, when steam and electricity were not known as wonderful industrial elements; and by trusting too implicitly to foreign statesmen, who planned for America to plod for European riches; this nation finds that a larger share of its industry and exchanges is made up of money, and less of credit.

America is younger, and has not yet acquired the enormous credit of the older states of Europe. She hopefully bides her time, and meanwhile plies her energies and resources with a currency of her own. Has there been enough? Shall there be more?

From this exhibit and comparison, very well and generally understood by the people, it must be conceded that the general impression that the volume of currency was inadequate had much to do with the extent and character of the panic. The public judgment is as well grounded to-day that the currency is insufficient to answer the necessary demands of the country. Notwithstanding this, an attempt to meet this just demand for an increase of currency is assailed with exaggerated deprecations and alarming forebodings of consequent ruin to the land. The honorable chairman has indulged in this when saying—I read from his speech, page 15:

"I say to Senators that if now, in this time of temporary panic, a great part of which, as I shall show you, has already passed over, we yield one single inch to the desire for paper money in this country, we shall pass the Rubicon, and there will be no power in Congress to check the issue. * * * And when you have passed the Rubicon and have fulfilled the pledges you have already made to the people of the United States, where can you stop? Where our ancestors stopped at the close of the Revolution; where the French people stopped in the midst of their revolutionary fervor!"

The honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] on the 17th of last month, sketched the frightful apparition of French assignats as a warning to an increase of our own currency. Assignats were mere assignments of sequestered lands, which could not be possessed till formally put up for sale. Thus based and thus obstructed, with no national security, and an issue of 45,000,000,000 francs, equal to $9,000,000,000 of our money, can this be a worthy or noticeable parallel to our national-bank issue, based upon 90 per cent. of bonds of the nation, secured by the total wealth and honor of the country, and necessarily limited at the utmost by the outstanding bonds of the United States? There are less of these bonds than we had of different forms of circulation in 1866, and still the suppositious issue of the possible maximum of what we once endured is made the occasion of invoking the specter of $9,000,000,000 of French assignats. Poor substitute, indeed, for argument upon a grave national subject. When in February, 1863, it was proposed by the House of Representatives to add to the volume of currency, an issue, under a national banking system, of three hundred millions of national-bank notes, the honorable chairman, then a member of the Finance Committee, seemed possessed with like alarm, which found expression as follows, as I read it from the Globe of the third session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, part 1, page 842:

"We must check it; we must put a stop to it; whatever may be the hazards, we must check this over expansion and overissue. * * * I say it is a danger before which a lost battle sinks into insignificance, and if we permit this inflation to go on, we shall do our country a greater harm than the confederates can possibly do by defeating any one of our armies."

This vain terror was substantially repeated by the honorable Senator recently with zeal and fervor. We had, in 1863, three hundred million of greenbacks and one hundred and sixty millions of State-bank issues, making four hundred and sixty millions, and the proposition was to add three hundred millions of national-bank issue, to make a total of seven hundred and sixty millions of circulation, and evils of such terrific character were to befall the nation. Did they follow? Gold was then 154. We had in December, 1864—the following year—seven hundred and ninety-five millions of currency; in December, 1865, nine hundred and forty-six millions, with gold at 145; in December, 1866, the volume in various forms of circulation reached $1,571,000,000, and gold declined to 134; and in December, 1867, there was $1,022,000,000 in circulation, with gold at 133—a decline of twenty-one cents on gold upon an increase of circulation of $262,000,000 over that in 1863, when such fearful prognostications were uttered, while the country prospered in spite of those ominous utterances. The evil omens predicted to-day, to follow expansion, will equally prove to be the morbid speculations of a timid policy, and find as little fulfillment as they did before.

But we hear further from the honorable chairman that—

"We are bound by public faith and good policy to bring our currency to the gold standard; that such a result was provided for by the financial policy adopted when the currency was authorized; that a departure from this policy was adopted after the war was over and after the necessity for a depreciated currency ceased, and that we have only to restore the old policy to bring us safely, surely, and easily to a specie standard."

The war ended substantially by the surrender of Lee to Grant, April 9, 1865, and gold stood then 144. To-day it is 111. Has this proven a departure from the faith and policy to bring our currency toward a gold standard?

But more. The honorable chairman has called attention to the solemn pledge the nation has made; and the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] urged this with renewed force. What was the pledge which stands as a lion in the pathway of an expansion of the currency? First, it is asserted that if the expansion is sought through an increase of the greenbacks, it is a violation of public faith. It is thus stated by the honorable chairman:

"An increase of paper money beyond four hundred millions would be a clear and palpable violation of the public faith. * * * It was a solemn promise that, under no circumstances, never, would we issue more than four hundred millions of paper money, and an additional reserve of fifty millions pledged to pay a debt then existing and which has since been paid."

The act of June 30, 1864, is the one which it is claimed made the promise. What did it provide? Let me read:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, $400,000,000, and to issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, after any period not less than five nor more than thirty years, or, if deemed expedient, made payable at any period not more than forty years from date."

Then came the second section:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury may issue on the credit of the United States, and in lieu of an equal amount of bonds authorized by the preceding section, and as a part of said loan, not exceeding $200,000,000, in Treasury notes of any denomination not less than ten dollars, payable at any time not exceeding three years from date, or, if thought more expedient, redeemable at any time after three years from date, and bearing interest not exceeding the rate of 7.3 per cent., payable in lawful money at maturity, or, at the discretion of the Secretary, semi-annually. And the said Treasury notes may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the best terms that can be obtained, for lawful money; and such of them as shall be made payable, principal and interest, at maturity, shall be a legal tender to the same extent as United States notes, for their face value, excluding interest; and may be paid to any creditor of the United States at their face value, excluding interest, or to any creditor willing to receive them at par, including interest."

And then comes the proviso:

"That the total amount of bonds and Treasury notes authorized by the first and second sections of this act shall not exceed $400,000,000, in addition to the amounts heretofore issued; nor shall the total amount of United States notes, issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan."

It is thus seen that at the very time this limit was fixed by "solemn promise," that no more than four hundred millions of United States notes should be issued, two hundred million Treasury notes were then already authorized, so that the promise covered really six hundred millions legal-tenders; and we have but four hundred millions to-day. That is stating it less than it was. We actually had at that time an authorized issue of legal-tenders of four hundred and fifty millions, old demand notes sixty millions, and legal-tender Treasury notes two hundred millions, making a total of seven hundred and ten millions. That I am not mistaken, let me refer to a debate in the Senate April 1, 1866, when the honorable chairman then stated the whole issue of legal-tenders of various forms, after the old demands and part of the greenbacks were retired, to be $602,973,048, and the total volume of circulation to be $913,665,947.

When this "solemn promise" of June 30, 1864, referred to, was made, gold was 250, on a total volume of circulation of about eight hundred millions, and a bonded debt of $1,766,408,291. April 1, 1866, when we had a total circulation of $913,665,947 and a bonded debt of $2,624,889,891, gold stood at 128. How much, under such an array of currency and bonded debt, the public faith was violated, the fall of the gold barometer is the most fitting answer.

If scruples still linger in the breast of any as to the letter, if not the spirit of the promise, standing in the way of the needed increase of circulation, I may point to the way for removal by repeal, in the language of the honorable Senator from Ohio, uttered January 9, 1868. (I read from the Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, second session, page 407:)

"Mr. SHERMAN. * * * The act of June 30, 1864, limits the amount of United States legal-tender notes to $400,000,000. That act contains a provision in the nature of a compact by which it is provided that in no event shall the amount of United States notes issued or to be issued ever exceed $400,000,000. This is made a part of the loan of that date, and is in the nature of a compact so far as a provision, which is repealable like any other act of Congress, can be called a compact." * *

In emergencies, expedients any more than blessings never go single. As another insuperable barrier in the way of any further increase of the currency, the pledge of March 18, 1869, is quoted and pressed. The honorable chairman has scarcely spoken without ringing the changes of this solemn pledge. What is that pledge?

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

It will be observed that the pledge does not determine the time of fulfillment.

The honorable chairman, however, enforces it thus in his speech:

"I rest upon this pledge of the public faith. Under what circumstances was it made? The condition of our currency, the obligation of our bonds, the nature of our promises, had been discussed before the people of the United States in the campaign of 1868; various theories had been advanced; and the result was that those who regarded the faith of the nation as pledged to pay not only the bonds of the United States, but the notes also, in coin prevailed, and General Grant was elected President of the United States. On the eastern portico of the Capitol on the 4th of March, 1869, he made this declaration:

"'A great debt has been contracted in securing to us and our posterity the Union. The payment of this, principal and interest, as well as the return to a specie basis, as soon as it can be accomplished without material detriment to the debtor class or to the country at large, must be provided for. To protect the national honor every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold, unless otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Let it be understood that no repudiator of one farthing of our public debt will be trusted in public place, and it will go far toward strengthening a credit which ought to be the best in the world, and will ultimately enable us to replace the debt with bonds bearing less interest than we now pay.'

* * * "Congress made this promise five years ago. The people believed it and business men believed it. Four years have passed away since then, and your dollar in greenbacks is worth no more to-day than it was on the 18th of March, 1869, and no act of yours has even tended to advance the value of that greenback to par in gold, while every affirmative act of yours since that time has tended to depreciate its value and to violate your promise. * * * * *

"It is the promise of a great, proud, and rich people, who mean what they say, that every practicable means shall be used to that end."

What does "practicable means" import? The lexicographer defines "practicable" in this wise:

"That may be done, effected, or performed by human means or by powers that can be applied. It was possible for Archimedes to lift the world, but it was not practicable."

Hence, it was not so much the declaration of good faith as it was the acts of good faith.

It has not passed from the memory of Senators that during the campaign of 1868 doubts were often expressed by opposition partisans in respect of the payment of the national obligations, whether in coin or currency.

To settle this doubt, so far as words could do it, the President in his first inaugural, and Congress in its first act presented for the signature of President Grant, declared the intention of the Government to pay its obligations in coin.

At that date, March 18, 1869, the volume of circulation was seven hundred millions, and the total debt of the nation was $2,525,463,269. The five-twenty 6 per cent. bonds of 1862 stood in market at 89, and the ten-forty 5 per cent. bonds of 1864 were at 81, and gold was 132.

The average prices of gold in the following months were, April, 133; May, 139; June, 138; July, 136; August, 134; September, 136; showing an advancing rate upon this official and legislative declaration of good faith. When, however, by October, 1869, $56,968,187 of the public debt had been paid, gold declined to 130. December 31, 1869, $76,716,306 of the public debt had been paid, gold fell to 121. On July 1, 1870, when $139,000,000 of the public debt was canceled, gold had dropped to 112. The total amount thus paid of the public debt was $272,684,493. Our five-twenty 6 per cent. bonds then reached par from 89, their value in March, 1869, and gold had declined from 132 to 112. In the face of this decrease of public debt, and price of gold, and the appreciation of our bonds from 89 to 100, in coin, is it a just reflection upon the practical good faith and execution of a solemn promise to say, as the honorable chairman did in his speech—

"Congress made this promise five years ago. The people believed it and business men believed it. Four years have passed away since then, and your dollar in greenbacks is worth no more to-day than it was on the 18th of March, 1869; and no act of yours has even tended to advance the value of that greenback to par in gold, while every affirmative act of yours since that time has tended to depreciate its value and to violate your promise."

Let the public judge, with the facts, of the national fidelity.

Furthermore, the pledge of the act of 1869 exacted that—

"None of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder."

As United States notes are not yet "convertible into coin," have we not rather violated the solemn promise in this respect? Let the honorable chairman answer. I read from his speech:

"Sir, let us see what has been done. We have paid $400,000,000 of the public debt, and we boast of it—of debt not due for years. We have paid to redeem that debt a premium of $40,000,000. In other words, we have paid $440,000,000 to redeem four hundred millions of debt not yet due, and we have not redeemed a single debt that was due in March, 1869; but, on the contrary, we have increased the kind of debts then due more in proportion than the increase of our population."

Again:

"But this promise to pay in coin extended to the bondholder. We promised to pay the bondholder gold for his bond and the people gold for their greenbacks. We have fulfilled our promise to the bondholder. We have paid him in gold. We have bought the gold. We have paid him at a premium of 10 per cent. on our currency.

"Sir, I regard it as the proudest achievement of the American people that so soon after the war they so faithfully and honorably redeemed their obligation to the bondholder. I demand the same honorable fulfillment of your promise to the noteholder."

Having violated our solemn promise in paying unmatured public debt to the extent of four hundred millions; having faithfully "fulfilled our promise to the bondholder," it is hardly with sober grace that the demand is made for a fulfillment of promise to the noteholder. The people make no demand that greenbacks should be paid in gold. In the midst of the panic, when gold could be obtained for greenbacks at 2 per cent. premium, the people cared not to convert into coin. In the worst days of the panic gold stood at 6 per cent. and greenbacks 4 per cent. premium.

There may be such a thing as sticking in the bark on this plea of public faith. Some have the art of putting things; the people have a way of applying things.

The honorable chairman in his speech referred to the proposition once urged, of paying our obligations in greenbacks, as follows:

"If the old idea of Mr. Pendleton had prevailed, that these bonds should be paid in greenbacks, then there would be a motive for us to depreciate the greenbacks in order to pay off our bonds at the cheapest rate."

And, by the way, I would add, supported in 1867 by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] when he said:

"The principal (bonds) was payable in whatever was the legal tender of the country."

These remind me of a singular counterpart, occurring in the debate on the bill for the contraction of the currency, January 15, 1868, contained in the Congressional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress, page 522. House bill No. 213, to suspend further reduction of the currency, being under consideration—

"Mr. SPRAGUE. A word in reference to the holders of the different securities, who now demand that they shall be paid in gold, and to that end the whole attention of Congress and of the Government of the country has been directed. What injustice, may I ask, is there in paying the holders of these bonds seventy dollars in gold when they took them at fifty dollars in gold?

"Mr. SHERMAN. There is none in the world, and we have the right now to go into the markets in New York and buy the different bonds for seventy, or seventy-two in gold, or whatever the market price is, if we have the gold with which to do it. There is no difficulty in that; the trouble is that we have not the gold."

When no prudent business man ever permits himself to buy his own payable paper at a discount, it is, in behalf of a Government contending for acts of good faith, suggested by one of its financial organs that it is right to pay redeemable obligations at 28 to 30 per cent. discount in coin, and wrong to pay such obligations at their face in greenbacks—the equivalent of the coin price. I can only say, in answer to the scrupulous prating for "inviolate public faith," that I commit the art of fixing the point where bad faith ends and where good faith begins to the domain of commercial ethics, and let the public pronounce judgment upon these two samples. The honorable chairman has not always indulged in this morbid tenacity for constitutional scruples. When the lamented Mr. Fessenden was chairman of the Committee on Finance, the honorable Senator, who was then a member, but who now graces its head, antagonized the then chairman on his scruples. I read from the Congressional Globe, Thirty-seventh Congress, second session, page 790:

"The chairman of the Committee on Finance gave us a very handsome lecture; a very able discourse upon the importance of preserving the public faith; and he desired to impress upon us—and did impress upon me—the necessity of not affecting the obligation of contracts. We must not in any emergency, under any stress of circumstances, affect the obligation of contracts between private individuals. Did that Senator overlook the first contract, the contract between the Government and the soldier, the Government and the men who feed and clothe your armies? We must pay the soldier in money; we must pay the contractor in money. There is a contract, an obligation between the contractor and the soldier and the Government, that must be observed. The same obligation of good faith rests upon us to pay every dollar that is due from us to our own creditors, as well as not to impair the obligation of contracts between others. How can you do it? * * * I have shown that you cannot do it in gold. * * * There is no other way except to issue to your creditor the note of the United States, in such form, with such sanctions, as will enable him to use it as money. If we can believe the testimony of others and the light of reason, the only way we can do this is by stamping them with the same national sanctions with which you stamp your gold and silver coin. * * * * * *

"If we can compel one citizen to take this paper money, why not another and another? Is it any less the violation of contract in the one case than in another? Do not all citizens hold their property subject to our unlimited power of taxation? Do not all share in the blessings of Government, and should not all share in its burdens? Shall we inflict a loss only on those who trust, labor for the Government, and relieve the selfish, avaricious, idle, unpatriotic citizen who will neither fight for, lend to, nor aid the Government? Sir, to make all these share in the burden of the war, and to relieve those who risk life and property in its defense, I would waive a constitutional scruple."

From these idle deprecations, lest the public faith be violated, in supplying the people with sufficient means to enable themselves to vindicate and maintain their credit and the public faith, let me pass to another form of intimidation and entreaty. It is in memorial guise, and best formulated in the language of the honorable chairman, which I read from his speech, page 37:

"But, sir, there is one other reason why all these plans and all these schemes of more paper money ought not even to be debated here. An increase of paper money beyond four hundred millions would be a clear and palpable violation of the public faith. In the darkest hours of the war, when every patriot trembled, when our fate hung in the balance, when our armies were before Richmond, when our armies were on the march through Georgia to the sea, when everybody felt that the danger of inconvertible paper money was likely to strike us from the list of nations, when our paper money then outstanding had fallen so that it took $2.80 to buy one dollar in gold, gold being at a premium of 280, then it was that we entered into a stipulation with the public creditor, which is a part of the act of 1864, a part of the act under which we borrowed money and pledged the public faith."

Although, as I have already quoted, in this same speech it is declared as of world-wide congratulation that it is regarded "as the proudest achievement of the American people, that so soon after the war they so faithfully and honorably redeemed their obligations to the bondholder," nevertheless it is implied in the quoted allusion to the "darkest hours of the war," that it was the danger of inconvertible paper money that threatened "to strike us from the list of nations," and it was so fallen in value "that it took $2.80 to buy one dollar in gold;" and that the "stipulation with the public creditor" in the act of 1864, was the solemn pledge that rescued the nation from annihilation, and recovered the value of our greenbacks.

It is no disparagement to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance to remind him that it was not mainly his valuable aid in framing this "stipulation with the public creditor," but really the triumph of our arms, which solved the doubt resting upon the unity of the nation, and was the immediate cause of the rapid decline in gold.

Then, again, it is bruited that the people protest against increase of currency and demand resumption, and actions of boards of trade and chambers of commerce are invoked to affirm this report.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in his last speech told us:

"Therefore Senators need not hug that pleasant idea to the soul that they are benefiting the great agricultural community by continuing paper money; and if they are not benefiting the agriculturists, see what evidence that nobody is benefited we have in the meetings of those engaged in active business throughout the country, representing all portions of the country, in boards of trade, especially that one recently held at Baltimore, the National Board of Trade, which voted on the question of resumption, as we have seen by their memorial, and out of forty-four representatives, only nine were opposed to resumption, and of these there were a majority even from the Western States in favor of it. Take the question in New York; take it in Baltimore; take it in Philadelphia, or in Boston; they all speak with but one sentiment; they are overwhelmingly in favor of a return at an early day to specie payments; and if these men cannot speak for the business interests of the country, who can?"

This organized pressure is no new embodiment of convenient public sentiment. Similar bodies with like assumption and pressure appeared in 1862, and representing sentiment then in favor of making greenbacks a legal tender for customs and other public and private dues, then in accord with Senators who now hold opposite sentiments upon the nature of Government issues. I read from the Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-seventh Congress, part 1, page 789:

"In the first place, I will say every organ of financial opinion—if that is a correct expression—in this country agrees that there is such a necessity in case we authorize the issue of demand notes. You commence with the Secretary of the Treasury, who has given the subject the most ample consideration. He declares, not only in his official communications here, but in his private intercourse with the members of the committee, that this clause is indispensably necessary to the security and negotiability of these demand notes. We all know from his antecedents, from his peculiar opinions, that he would be probably the last man among the leading politicians of our country to yield to the necessity of substituting paper money for coin. He has examined this question in all its length and breadth. He is in a position where he feels the necessity. He is a statesman of admitted ability and distinguished in his high position. He informs us that without this clause the attempt to circulate as money the proposed amount of demand notes of the United States will prove a fatal experiment.

"In addition to his opinion, we have the concurring opinion of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York. With almost entire unanimity they have passed a resolution on the subject after full debate and consideration. That resolution has been read by your Secretary. You have also the opinion of the committee on public safety of the city of New York, composed of distinguished gentlemen, nearly all of whom are good financiers, who agree fully in the same opinion. I may say the same in regard to the Chambers of Commerce of the city of Boston, of the city of Philadelphia, and of almost every recognized organ of financial opinion in this country. They have said to us in the most solemn form that this measure was indispensably necessary to maintain the credit of the Government, and to keep these notes anywhere near par. In addition, we have the deliberate judgment and vote of the House of Representatives. After a full debate, in which the constitutionality, expediency, and necessity of this measure were discussed, in which all the objections that have been made here and many more were urged, the House of Representatives, by a large vote, declared that it was necessary to issue demand notes, and that this clause was indispensable to their negotiation and credit.

"There is no other way except to issue to your creditor the note of the United States in such form, with such sanctions as will enable him to use it as money. If we can believe the testimony of others and the light of reason, the only way we can do this is by stamping them with the same national sanction with which you stamp your gold and silver coin. * * * * * *

"If we can compel one citizen to take this paper money, why not another and another? Is it any less the violation of contract in the one case than in another? Do not all citizens hold their property subject to our unlimited power of taxation? Do not all share in the blessings of Government and should not all share in its burdens? Shall we inflict a loss only on those who trust; labor for the Government, and relieve the selfish, avaricious, idle, unpatriotic citizen who will neither fight for, lend to, nor aid the Government? Sir, to make all these share in the burden of the war, and to relieve those who risk life and property in its defense, I would waive a constitutional doubt."

I have read this from the Globe merely to show the views then held as to the duty of Government to make its currency of the highest type and above depreciation. Chambers of commerce and boards of trade were then invoked to make greenbacks lawful money for all purposes, which would have made them equivalent to coin, as the old demand notes were, and as French currency, under suspension, now is, and have removed all possible objections of Senators to free banking. Now like bodies are brought to bear against increase of currency or free banking, and they would as loudly protest against a proposition to make greenbacks to-day a full tender for public and private uses, which would, in my judgment, cut the gordian knot of depreciated currency. It matters little to call attention to the unjust inequality of the present distribution of currency. Congress, recognizing this, passed an act in 1870 providing for the withdrawal of twenty-five millions from the Eastern States, and its redistribution in the remaining States of the Union, but the law is practically a nullity. The Comptroller of the Currency has reported the practical difficulty in enforcing the statute.

The pending bill, looking to the execution of that law, meets a formal protest from Rhode Island, and one of its distinguished Senators ably presses that protest with an argument against the injustice and peril of such withdrawal. He declared that Rhode Island had no more currency than she needed. What has New England of the national-bank currency? The Comptroller of the Currency reports the per capita of circulation in the named sections as follows: New England, $31.15; Middle States, $12.80; South and Southwestern States, $2.98; Western States, $7.11. The United States on an equal distribution would have $9.18.

New England, then, has per capita $21.97 more than the national average; the Middle States, $3.62 more; the Southern States, $6.20 less than that average, and the Western States, $2.07 less.

What is needed for New England ought to be the measure of other States. This illustrates the great inequality.

When we propose to repeal the statute of withdrawal, and let New England have all of her $31.15 per capita, and modestly ask for forty-six millions for the deficient States, under the substitute of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] that is stoutly antagonized by the East.

This seems a very poor appreciation of and response to the generosity the West and South exhibited only two years since upon no valid claims whatever. It will be remembered that after the act of February 2, 1872, passed for the apportionment of Representatives to Congress among the several States, according to the ninth census, Vermont especially, through her able chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, now absent, striving, I am glad to say, to recuperate an overtaxed system—Vermont, New Hampshire, and New York plead for additional Representatives, and each with less than half a ratio unrepresented by the act of February 2. A supplemental act was passed May 30, 1872, to enlarge their representation, even under a declining population compared with the West.

To exhibit the increase of population of New England and New York, now combined against the West and South on the financial question, and the increase of the rest of the States and Territories, that the relative increase of population between the two sections may be appreciated, I give the population of 1860 and 1870, according to the census of each year, as follows:

Population.	1860.	1870.	Increase.
New England	3,135,283	3,487,924	354,641
New York	3,880,735	4,382,759	502,024
Total	7,016,018	7,870,683	*856,665
Other States and Territories	24,427,303	30,685,300	†6,257,997

*Being an increase of 12 per cent. † Being an increase of 26 per cent.

I also subjoin a table, which I ask may be printed, and which will show how generously the West and South acted toward the East then, in the matter of apportionment of Representatives, and now that we ask for rights under an equal apportionment of circulation that generosity is negatived.

Moreover, if we heed the suggestion that inasmuch as the present banking system cramps the capital of the country, by, first, a premium of 10 per cent. paid on bonds pledged for security of circulation; then a margin of 10 per cent. additional security by receiving but ninety dollars currency for each one hundred of bonds; next 15 or 25 per cent. of the circulation held as reserve, making in all 35 to 45 per cent. idle capital, leaving only 65 or 55 per cent. of bank capital active to transact the national banking business of the country, and join by saying there ought not to be opposition to the national banks, then we are commended. But when it is proposed, through the substitute of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania,

[Mr. CAMERON,] to relieve this close corporation of banking of this idle capital burden, by sharing it, under free banking, with the whole people, commendation turns into denunciation, and a majority of the Senate defeats it.

If we appeal to the generosity of bankers and point to their extraordinary profits—many of the banks, in their declared dividends and surplus carried to the capital stock, averaging annually profits of from 15 to 20 per cent.—and ask that the privilege of such lucrative business be extended to others, New York and New England capitalists and gold-brokers appear in force to defeat the slightest concession. They surround this Capitol with the cry of "Money plenty in New York;" "The crisis is ended," and assume to say that the country wants resumption, no matter what the destruction is to the industrial pursuits of the land or the disasters to private or corporate fortunes.

The people, who in the main are debtors, held to their employments to save themselves from ruin, have no time nor means to spare to make themselves heard by confronting creditors and capitalists at this Capitol.

The proportion of creditors to debtors of the country is as 1 to 9. Against the interests of nine-tenths of the population, it is proposed to frame legislation for the interests of one-tenth. Resumption is gain of the shrinkage of value between currency and gold to the one-tenth and loss of it to the nine-tenths.

This same spirit of monopoly is graphically portrayed editorially in the Chronicle of 29th of last January, under comments upon opposition to needed appropriations involving employment to the many about this District, who go "hungry to bed," or "hear their children cry for food." I read from this article, descriptive of like monopolists:

"If they can only succeed in defeating the passage of relief bills, money will remain 'tight,' note-shaving will continue to be lucrative, and these marvels, in their own eyes, of public probity will rejoice in their assured victory over those whom they have ruined; and unless 'saved by grace' will certainly go where such note-shavers ought to go."

Tightness of money increases the opportunities for exaction, and enhances to a ruinous extent the rates of interest. Prostration of industry, check in manufactures, arrest of traffic and travel, are the results of hostility to an adequate currency, and are the fragments lying along the perilous way of resumption.

When we reflect that the annual increase of national wealth is but 3½ per cent., and rates of interest for business now range from 10 to 24 per cent., it needs no gift to foresee how the borrowers of the land are being pressed into the meshes of the lenders. The producers fast bend under their burdens to the feet of the non-producers. General stagnation of industry is foreseen if not yet foreknown; while the fewer money-mongers, like undertakers, thrive most when commercial death abounds.

The product of national wealth in 1860 was $4,000,000,000; in 1870 over $8,000,000,000. It must have been last fiscal year $10,000,000,000.

Commercial credit is indispensable to the industries of so growing a nation. It must be individual if not national credit. When money was adequate, enterprise quickened, business thrived, resources developed, and wealth augmented. Prosperity smiled upon our land the past years succeeding the war. My worthy colleague, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who, however, differs with me upon the policy to be pursued, spoke justly upon this point, when he said in his speech on the 20th of last month—and I read from the RECORD of that day's proceedings.

In speaking of 1865, following the war, he said:

"The people were out of debt all over the country. They had obtained high prices for everything they had to sell during the war. The farmers were out of debt, the business of the country was transacted for cash, and the whole country was comparatively out of debt, but the Government was not."

How much better for individual interests and for the general prosperity it was for the nation to extend its credit, and thus put meanto the hands of its people to pay as they went, we have the gratifys ing record of past experience to assure. It has been tried and is worthy of imitation. It were better that the discount or depreciation of 10 per cent. upon our circulation be recognized by the people in the multifarious transactions of the country, and that a sufficient volume be provided for their wants, to stimulate industry and ingenuity, and for the benefit of all, than to contract the means and subject the people to the ruinous rates of interest, of an individual credit system. When money is adequate, rates of interest, decline; when stringent, interest advances. In the summer months, when money accumulates largely in New York, rates are quite nominal; at other seasons the rates are seriously prejudicial.

To-day it is boastfully reported that the crisis and consequences are over, because money is plenty in New York.

Plenty it may be on call simply, but not to save even New York merchants, much less borrowers out of the city. What is commercially termed gilt-edged paper goes begging even now in Wall street at 10 to 15 per cent.

The startling proof that former years of prosperity, under a better supply of currency for the wants of the country, are giving way to gradual but inevitable disaster, is seen in the record of business failures throughout the States, given by the mercantile agency for the four years past.

In 1870 and 1871 the volume of currency, increased by the fifty-four millions of 1870, was to the extent of business demands of those years a fairer ratio than the volume is now to the wants of the present.

The failures given for 1870 are 3,551, with liabilities of $88,242,000; those of 1871 are 2,915, and liabilities $85,252,000; in 1872 they were 4,069, and liabilities $121,056,000; and last year (1873) the number of failures was 5,183, and the liabilities $228,499,000. There were more failures in 1873 than in 1872 by 1,100, and with an increase of liabilities of $107,443,000.

This gives us the total results of the prevailing conviction that the currency of the country was falling below the necessities of the people. It grew into brooding apprehension that measurably checked industry and trade and broke out into the disasters of panic and its cruel effects. Who would add to this ruin by apathy or contraction? Let the record tell.

The Comptroller of the Currency in his report, as I have already noticed, states that the national-bank currency is divided, per head, as follows: New England, $31.15; Middle States, $12.80; South and Southwestern States, $2.98; Western States, $7.11.

The volume of Treasury notes or greenbacks is larger than the national-bank currency; therefore like division of that would give, per head, in round numbers of both currencies, to New England, $62; Middle States, $26; South and Southwestern States, $6; and Western States, $14.

New England enjoying $62 per capita of circulation has not been heard to ask for a contraction of this for fear of "inflation;" nay, Rhode Island protests against any contraction of New England's quota.

What would this per capita be for the whole country? Twenty-four hundred and eighty millions. If it is no inflation for New England, by parity of reason, it should be none for the whole country. Under free banking, if all the outstanding bonds of the Government were held at home and deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury for national currency, 90 per cent. would be but fourteen hundred and forty millions of currency as the whole possible volume. New England's present quota of currency would for like quota to the whole nation give a volume of twenty-four hundred and eighty millions. The absurdity of the cry of "inflation" is rendered more deceptive when it is used to defeat an increase of only forty-six millions on the plea of resumption.

New England is solid for resumption, except the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] whose mammoth business enterprises have not been the least of his honors, and whose wise forecast supports expansion. New York is solid also. The East then, with its centralization of capital, aided by ancillary money-centers in different States, and supported by the Golden Slope, holds its grasp, and will not relax, even to equalize the unequal supply of circulation in the South and West.

A section, class, and capitalists, may conspire and combine to dictate the monetary basis of a free country; but in behalf of the multitude—the mass of business and industrial architects of the country's fortune—we shall continue to protest and act.

If defeated now, time will add to our ranks. The example of a combination against us of capitalists, class, and section, will make apt scholars in causing the reappearance in this Chamber and yonder Hall, of Representatives of toilers, classes, and sections, in union, and holding party subordinate to country, that the interest of the whole, above that of a part, may be respected.

The people then will boldly put, as they now quietly hint, the question, "Why, if bonds are deemed a good conversion for currency as a step toward specie resumption, why can like bonds, fortified by 10 per cent. margin, possibly jeopardize the needed volume of currency for which they are pledged? The people will need to know why the difference is made between the two, and the question, though here adversely taken, must yet pass the tribunal of public judgment, whether the monopoly of banking shall still be tolerated to enrich the few, or be ended by opening its privileges and benefits to the many.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GORDON. I hope the Senator will give way for a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting that motion, the Chair will, with the indulgence of the Senate, present the House bills on his table, for reference.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 2094½) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Bell;

A bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas;
A bill (H. R. No. 2088) for the relief of James Lillie, postmaster at Lisbonville, Ray County, Missouri; and
A bill (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 650) for the relief of John Brennan;
A bill (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief Willard Davis; and
A bill (H. R. No. 2100) for the relief of Martin Hoff, Casper Doerr, and George Gebhart, citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Territories:

A bill (H. R. No. 921) to prevent the useless slaughter of buffaloes within the Territories of the United States; and
A bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for the apportionment of the Territory of Wyoming, for legislative purposes.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia; and
A bill (H. R. No. 2090) for the relief of Jacob Harding.

The bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a western judicial district of North Carolina," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 2350) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificate of registry and enrollment to the schooner Almina and changing the name to Minnie Davis, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 2187) authorizing and requiring the issuance of a patent for certain land in the county of Scott, in the State of Missouri, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORDON. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 10, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

VIOLATION OF REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to ask the House to adopt the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the amount of money paid since November 30, 1873, to the 1st of March, 1874, by any person or persons, in the settlement of suits, judgments, or claims made by or in behalf of the United States, for the violation of the revenue laws at the Boston and New York custom-houses; the amount and date of all such payments, and the names of the persons making the same, respectively; also what portion of such sum was paid into the Treasury of the United States; designating in each case the amount thereof so paid in as duties, and what portion of cash, (if any,) was paid elsewhere than into said Treasury, and to whom.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to present the following preamble and resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the convention which assembled at Wheeling in the year 1861, looking to the formation of a new State out of a part of the territory then embraced in the limits of the State of Virginia, and now known as the State of West Virginia, did, by an ordinance of the 20th of August, 1861, stipulate and agree that the new State proposed to be formed should take upon itself a great proportion of the debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to 1st January, 1861, to be ascertained in the mode therein provided; and whereas the constitution framed by said convention and under which the State of West Virginia was admitted into the Union, did, in express terms, assume to pay an equitable proportion of said debt, and did require the Legislature of that State to provide a sinking fund for that purpose; and the State of Virginia having assented to and acquiesced in the formation of the new State of West Virginia upon the terms and conditions aforesaid, and the Congress of the United States having, in the act admitting West Virginia into the Union, approved and ratified the proceedings in the premises; and whereas the State of West Virginia, though often and earnestly requested to do so by the State of Virginia, has neglected and refused to adjust and settle the debt aforesaid, and to provide for the payment of her just and equitable proportion thereof: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into and ascertain what legislation, if any, is necessary on the part of Congress to require the State of West Virginia to take upon herself the payment of a "just and equitable proportion" of the debt of the State of Virginia prior to the 1st of January, A. D. 1861, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. How does that resolution come in?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that it be considered.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to its present consideration. I do so because I see no Representative from West Virginia present. I have no objection to its being referred.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTRACTS FOR INDIAN SUPPLIES.

Mr. ADAMS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas repeated complaints have been made of fraud, unfairness, and irregularity in the matter of contracts for Indian supplies and transportation for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, by which it is alleged that contracts have been awarded at rates greatly in advance of those at which other responsible persons propose to furnish the same supplies and render the same service, and in many instances privately without due advertisement as required by law, thus defrauding the Government to an alarming extent: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be directed to make thorough investigation into the facts connected with the transactions above referred to, and make report thereof to this House, setting forth in detail what grounds, if any, exist for the complaints referred to; what persons, if any, in connection with the administration of Indian affairs are responsible therefor, or are in any way interested therein; and what legislation, if any, is necessary to prevent like abuses in the future; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and have leave to report at any time.

Mr. ADAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGREEMENT WITH BANNACK AND OTHER INDIANS.

Mr. LAWSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2448) to ratify an agreement concluded November 7, 1873, with the Bannack and other Indians in Southern Idaho; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF TAXATION.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I desire to make a brief statement to the House.

On Monday of last week, in some remarks I had the honor to submit to the Committee of the Whole, I took occasion to say that the Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter to the Committee on Ways and Means, had recommended an increase of $42,000,000 in the amount levied in customs duties and internal-revenue taxes. In the same connection I submitted the letter upon which that remark was based, and the letter was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, upon page 9, after referring to the falling off in the revenues, said:

Should such be the case, I recommend additional taxation judiciously laid, so as to be the least burdensome upon the people and business of the country, rather than a resort to borrowing money and increasing the public debt.

In the same report he states the deficiency at $13,530,000, besides $29,000,000 for the sinking fund, making over $42,000,000 in all.

In the letter which I submitted, the Secretary had repeated the language which I have just read, and had presented a detailed statement from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon which it was stated taxes could be levied amounting to $22,150,000 a year. He had also submitted a statement in reference to the duties on tea and coffee, from which a yearly average of duties had been collected of $18,841,000.

Upon these facts I inferred that the Secretary desired that taxes should be levied to the amount of $42,000,000, and used the word "recommendation," a word which he had used in his annual report, and which he had quoted in the letter I had the honor to submit.

The Secretary of the Treasury, however, does not desire to have it understood that he even then recommended an increase of taxes to the amount of $42,000,000 a year; and I now state, so that I may not have even the appearance of doing him an injustice, that it was rather an inference from his letter than his direct statement which led me to the conclusion that he desired, and indicated a wish, for an increase of taxation to the amount of $42,000,000. At his request now, I say that it was not his intention to be understood then as recommending such an increase of taxation.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear the commencement of the statement of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] and I desire, in order that I may set myself right if I am mistaken, to inquire of him if he was authorized to state to the House that the Secretary of the Treasury at no time this session has urged upon the House the imposition of whatever taxes would result from the specific levies which he recommended in his own letter; and, further, whether he is authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to announce to the House and to the country that the Secretary no longer desired any additional taxation to be imposed.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I am not authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to make any statement different from the letter which he submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means in December; and I only desired to say that my statement that he recommended such an amount of taxation was an inference from that letter which I then had the honor to submit.

Mr. DAWES. I merely desire that I may not stand in the position here, before this House or the country, as undertaking to oppose as a policy of the Secretary of the Treasury what the Secretary of the Treasury may now have it go out to the country that he never recommended.

I have endeavored to be entirely faithful to that officer; and wherever I have found it necessary to differ from him, I have done it frankly, and stated wherein that difference has existed. I have understood the Secretary of the Treasury not only to recommend the imposition of taxes, but to feel it his duty to press it upon the consideration of the House. I shall be exceedingly gratified if anything has occurred in the increase of receipts of the revenue, in the revival of industry, or from any other source, that shall lead either him or any other officer of the Government to feel that there is less necessity now than there seemed to them in December to urge upon this House the necessity of the imposition of taxes.

My only solicitude in seeking the floor now is to ascertain if through some other organ the Secretary of the Treasury is desirous of suggesting to the House that after all he is not quite so anxious for taxes.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will not assume from my correction of the use of a word which the Secretary of the Treasury thinks is broader than his letter, that the Secretary desires any other organ in this House than that leader of the House upon whom Massachusetts, as well as the House, has been accustomed so much to rely.

DANIEL STICKNEY.

On motion of Mr. PAGE, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads were discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1905) for the relief of Daniel Stickney, postmaster at Presque Isle, Maine; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MASSACHUSETTS MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. PIERCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2449) to authorize the trustees of the Massachusetts Museum of Fine Arts to import and retain, for two years, free of duty, a collection of pictures for exhibition, on their giving bonds for the re-exportation of the same within that time; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MARE ISLAND NAVY-YARD.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with full information in regard to the necessity for a better supply of fresh water, and for the construction of improved sheds at the Mare Island navy-yard.

STATUE OF JEFFERSON.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, late an officer in the United States Navy.

The joint resolution was read. The preamble recites that the late Commodore Uriah P. Levy, while a lieutenant of the United States Navy, in 1834, procured in Paris a bronze statue of Jefferson by the celebrated sculptor David, which was presented by him, through Congress, to his fellow-citizens of the United States, and to which attention is now called by his brother, Jonas P. Levy, who requests that the statue, if not accepted by Congress, shall be returned to the heirs of the late Commodore Levy; and the resolution accepts the statue with grateful appreciation, and directs the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds to properly prepare and place the same in the National Statuary Hall of the Capitol.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at twenty-four minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on the Territories.

APPORTIONMENT OF WYOMING.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for the apportionment of the Territory of Wyoming for legislative purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the apportionment of the Territory of Wyoming for the election of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, shall be made by the governor thereof, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming," approved July 25, 1865, provided that for the purpose of such apportionment it shall not be necessary to take a new or additional census or enumeration of the Territory, and that the powers conferred upon the governor by the bill shall be continued in full force until an apportionment shall be made by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, under the provisions of the organic act thereof.

Mr. McKEE. I suppose there is no objection to that bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to inquire if that bill affects in any way the qualifications for suffrage in that Territory?

Mr. McKEE. There is not a word about woman suffrage in it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But I ask whether it affects the qualification for suffrage?

Mr. McKEE. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKEE] will explain how it becomes necessary to vest in the governor this very important power.

Mr. McKEE. It becomes necessary because the Legislature has failed to act on the subject. Under the organic act creating that Territory the governor was empowered and ordered, as in other Territories on their creation, to district and apportion the Legislature, that power to continue until after the first session of the Legislature. The Legislature of Wyoming, instead of passing an apportionment law themselves, delegated this power to three men, who were to establish and put in force an apportionment act. Congress on the 21st of February, 1871, repealed and annulled that act of the territorial Legislature, on the ground that the Legislature could not give power to three men to make a law of the Territory. Congress further authorized the governor to perform that duty for that session. The Legislature has just adjourned, and has failed to report an apportionment law, and now there is no binding apportionment law in the Territory.

Mr. HOLMAN. No apportionment for representatives has been made by the Legislature at any time?

Mr. McKEE. None at all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF BUFFALO.

Mr. FORT, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 921) to prevent the useless slaughter of buffaloes within the Territories of the United States.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that it shall hereafter be unlawful for any person who is not an Indian to kill, wound, or in any manner destroy any female buffalo, of any age, found at large within the boundaries of any of the Territories of the United States.

The second section provides that it shall be, in like manner, unlawful for any such person to kill, wound, or destroy in said Territories any greater number of male buffaloes than needed for food by such person, or than can be used, cured, or preserved for the food of other persons, or for the market. It shall be in like manner unlawful for any such person or persons to assist or be in any manner engaged or concerned in or about such unlawful killing, wounding, or destroying of any such buffaloes; that any person who shall violate the provisions of the act shall, on conviction, forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $100 for each offense, (and each buffalo so unlawfully killed, wounded, or destroyed, shall be and constitute a separate offense,) and on a conviction for a second offense may be committed to prison for a period not exceeding thirty days; and that all United States judges, justices, courts, and legal tribunals in said Territories shall have jurisdiction in cases of the violation of the law.

Mr. COX. I do not know whether that bill has been sufficiently matured by the committee.

Mr. FORT. I shall be glad to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I have been told by buffalo hunters that it is utterly impossible, while on the run, to tell the sex of the buffalo until it is run down and killed. This bill fixes a penalty for something that cannot possibly be a crime. It also gives to the Indian a preference in the business of killing buffaloes.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The penalty is only for killing. You can tell the sex after the buffalo is killed. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. The object of this bill is to prevent the early extermination of these noble herds from the plains. It is estimated that thousands of these harmless animals are annually slaughtered for their skins alone; that thousands more are slaughtered for their tongues alone; and that many thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, are killed every year in utter wantonness without any object whatever except to destroy them. This bill has been carefully considered by the committee, and, so far as I am advised, there is no opposition to it from any quarter. Very many persons who are in the habit of hunting these animals have given me their opinion that there is no difficulty whatever in reference to the subject mentioned by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] This bill does not contemplate the prohibition of any person joining in a reasonable chase and hunt of the buffalo. It provides that it shall be unlawful for any person at any time to kill a female buffalo, and that it shall be unlawful for any person except an Indian at any time to slaughter more of the male buffalo than is needed for the market or for their own use. So far as I am advised, gentlemen upon this floor representing all the Territories are favorable to the passage of this bill. I now yield to the gentleman from Arizona, [Mr. MCCORMICK.]

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to strike out the clause excepting the Indians from the operation of this bill? The Secretary of the Interior has already said to this House that the civilization of the Indian is impossible while the buffalo remains upon the plains.

Mr. FORT. Who has the floor, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] has the floor, and he yields to the gentleman from Arizona, [Mr. MCCORMICK.]

Mr. MCCORMICK. As preliminary to what I have to say, I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the New Mexican, a paper published in Santa Fé.

The Clerk read as follows:

The buffalo slaughter, which has been going on the past few years on the plains, and which increases every year, is wantonly wicked and should be stopped by the most stringent enactments and most vigilant enforcement of the law. Killing these noble animals for their hides simply, or to gratify the pleasure of some Russian duke or English lord, is a species of vandalism which cannot too quickly be checked. United States surveying parties report that there are two thousand hunters on the plains killing these animals for their hides. One party of sixteen hunters report having killed twenty-eight thousand buffaloes during the past summer. It seems to us there is quite as much reason why the Government should protect the buffaloes as the Indians.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Several years ago I introduced a bill to restrict the killing of the buffalo, and made a speech upon the subject. I have some hesitation in speaking upon the bill now before the House, as I am not familiar with it; indeed, I do not know by whom it was introduced. But I have no hesitation in calling the attention of the House to the importance of the subject. There is no doubt that thousands and tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of buffalo are slaughtered annually on the western plains in mere wanton sport.

I have here a letter from General Hazen, from which I will read a single extract. He says:

I know a man who killed with his own hand ninety-nine buffaloes in one day, without taking a pound of the meat. The buffalo for food has an intrinsic value, about equal to an average Texas beef, or say twenty dollars. There are probably not less than a million of these animals on the western plains. If the Government owned a herd of a million oxen they would at least take steps to prevent this wanton slaughter. The railroads have made the buffalo so accessible as to present a case not dissimilar.

I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that there are some features of this bill that will probably prove impracticable. But let us amend it, and make it practicable so far as possible. Indeed, I do not believe that any bill will entirely accomplish the purpose for which this bill is presented; but I think we ought to make an enactment that will at least have a tendency in that direction.

The buffalo is not only valuable for food for the Indians, but is of great value for food for the white man. I was stimulated in part to present the bill I introduced some time ago from the fact that I had been snow-bound, with a hundred other passengers, on the Kansas Pacific Railroad, and for some days we subsisted entirely upon the meat of the buffalo, having fortunately found at a picket station the carcasses of some five animals lately killed by soldiers. And I may say that the meat of the buffalo is regularly served at most of the stations upon that road in Kansas and Colorado. The meat of these animals is valuable, therefore, not only to the Indians, but to the settler and traveler; and their wanton destruction ought, if possible, to be stopped. It would have been well, both for the Indians and the white men, if an enactment of this kind had been placed on our statute-book years ago.

It will not do to say that the extermination of the buffalo will end our troubles with the Indians upon the plains. Those troubles will continue to a greater or less extent so long as there is an Indian, and I know of no one act that will gratify the red man more than to protect from reckless slaughter, at the hands of so-called sportsmen, the noble game upon which he has so long subsisted, and the true value of which he well appreciates.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am surprised that my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] upon so humane and meritorious a measure as this, should raise any captious objection because we cannot well make its provisions more definite. I regard the bill as an effort in a most commendable direction. Indeed, it is most remarkable that to this hour the inhuman slaughter upon the plains of herds of cattle which are alike beneficial to the Indians and the whole country should not have been forbidden by positive law. I trust that this bill will pass; that, even if it be found insufficient to accomplish the object, we shall at least inaugurate legislation on this subject. For one I thank the gentleman from Arizona for having brought forward the measure, and I trust the House will promptly pass it.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from Colonel Brackett, of the Second Cavalry.

The Clerk read as follows:

OMAHA BARRACKS, NEBRASKA,
January 30, 1872.

SIR: I have read with a great deal of interest the letter of General Hazen to you respecting the needless killing of buffaloes. What he says is strictly true; and there is as much honor and danger in killing a Texas steer as there is in killing a buffalo. All the reports about fine sport and good shooting are mere gammon. It would be equally as good sport, and equally as dangerous, to ride into a herd of tame cattle and commence shooting indiscriminately. The wholesale butchery of buffaloes upon the plains is as needless as it is cruel. Hundreds and hundreds of them have been killed in the most wanton manner, or for their tongues alone. It is time that something should be done for their protection; and I trust you will make an effort to have Congress interfere in their behalf. It is an abuse of language to call the killing of harmless and defenseless buffaloes sport.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. BRACKETT,
Lieutenant-Colonel Second United States Cavalry.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would not have objected to this bill but from the fact that it is partial in its provisions. Three years ago I introduced a bill on this subject, modeled after that of the gentleman from Arizona, which I ask the Clerk to read. My bill does not undertake to make impracticable provisions as to whether buffaloes shall be killed by Indians or white men, or as to the kind of buffaloes to be killed, whether male or female, or of what age. I do not think the killing of buffaloes amounts to game. I would just as soon shoot my mother's cow in the barn-yard as kill buffaloes for sport. There is no sport in such occupation. The point is this: we ought to save this portion of our public meat for some good purpose. The Secretary of the Interior has told us that the Indians never can be civilized until the buffaloes are extinguished. What does he mean by that? I ask members of the Administration party what he means by that. Nobody answers; no one can answer. [Laughter.] The buffaloes are to be extinguished exactly as the Indians are ultimately to be extinguished. Now, what I want is a bill that will impose a penalty on every man, red, white, or black, who may wantonly kill these buffaloes. I ask the Clerk to read the bill which I introduced three years ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That excepting for the purpose of using the meat for food, or preserving the skin, it shall be unlawful for any person to kill the bison, or buffalo, found anywhere upon the public lands of the United States; and for the violation of this law the offender shall, upon conviction, before any court of competent jurisdiction, be liable to a fine of $100 for each animal killed, one-half of which sum shall, upon its collection, be paid to the informer.

Mr. COX. I hope that bill may be adopted as a substitute for the one now presented.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT] yield to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to offer a substitute?

Mr. FORT. No, sir.

Mr. POTTER. I would like to know whether the greatest destruction of buffaloes within the last few years has been by the Indians or the white people?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] permit me to answer that question?

Mr. FORT. From all the information coming to me I believe that the wanton killing of buffaloes is always done by white men; that the Indian never goes into a herd of buffalo and shoots them down out of mere wanton wickedness. That is always done by white men; and it is the cause, as I am advised, of much collision between the white men and the red men, the red men objecting to having the buffalo killed in that manner.

Mr. POTTER. I understand that the killing of buffaloes for the sake of their skins has been carried on very largely during the last few years. I ask by whom that has been done?

Mr. FORT. I understand it is done by professional hunters.

Mr. POTTER. White or red?

Mr. FORT. White.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Last fall, when traveling in the West, I met several parties who, I was informed, were on their way to the buffalo region to kill buffaloes in mere sport. They were men from abroad, foreigners, who had come to this country to have the honor of saying that they had killed a buffalo. I was told that they went to the plains and shot down these animals, not even desiring to take their tongues or their pelts, and left them to rot upon the plains. If a measure can be devised which shall prevent such wanton cruelty and wickedness, it seems to me no man ought to object. I prefer the bill, as I understand it, to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] for the reason that the latter has in it pay to the informer, and I am not in favor of this moiety business, this informer business, this employment of spies. Nor, indeed, did I suppose that the gentleman from New York was in favor of having these creatures kept in our legislation any longer; I want them all struck out. I am surprised that the gentleman from New York should come in here with any such provision. I am not talking against the gentleman from New York at all, but against his bill.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. One word further. These same travelers, these foreigners, who go out to kill the buffalo in wanton sport, are also protected by our military force. We not only allow them to come here and kill the buffalo wantonly and wickedly, but at the same time we afford them protection by our arms.

Mr. BARRY. Not only that; but they are furnished horses by the Army to go out to kill the buffalo, as well as protection by escort of soldiers.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as I have glanced at it on the Clerk's desk, is every way right. If there is a single point suggested by any gentleman, it has been satisfactorily answered. But I have understood, and indeed I have heard it said, and said before the Committee on Appropriations, by a gentleman who is high in authority in the Government, the best thing which could happen for the betterment of our Indian question—the very best thing which could occur for the solution of the difficulties of that question—would be that the last remaining buffalo should perish, and he gave this as his reason for that statement: that so long as the Indian can hope to subsist by hunting buffalo, so long will he resist all efforts to put him forward in the work of civilization; that he would never cultivate the soil, never even become a pastoral owner or controller of flocks, never take a step toward civilization, until his savage means of support were cut off; and that his great support, the quarry, if I may use the word, out of which he secures the very meat he feeds on, is the herds of buffalo which roam over the plains of the West. The Secretary of the Interior said that he would rejoice, so far as the Indian question was concerned, when the last buffalo was gone.

Now, if the barbarism of killing buffalo for mere wanton sport has any compensation in it, perhaps it may be this is a compensation worthy of our consideration. I should like to know from gentlemen, especially those in charge of Indian affairs, whether they believe this theory is a sound one, and whether the very processes of civilization are not in their own course sweeping away the ground upon which Indian barbarism plants itself? It may be possible in our mercy to the buffalo we may be cruel to the Indian. It is the only possible objection which can be urged to this bill; and without at all indorsing the theory, I only offer it for the consideration of the House.

Mr. FORT. I cannot understand why the Secretary of the Interior should have used this language to the gentleman or to his committee, but certainly as an individual I am not in favor of civilizing the Indian by starving him to death, by destroying the means which God has given him for his support.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is just as much propriety in depopulating our rivers, in destroying the fish in our rivers, as in destroying the buffalo in order to induce the Indian to become civilized. We may as well not only destroy the buffalo, but the fish in the rivers, the birds in the air; we may as well destroy the squirrels, lizards, prairie-dogs, and everything else upon which the Indian feeds. The argument, Mr. Speaker, is a disgrace to anybody who makes it.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot conceive the propriety of establishing game laws in the United States for the simple use of the Indians. A great part of our expenditures of money, from year to year, is to feed the Indians, to get them on reservations where they may become civilized by cultivating the soil. Now, we have followed that policy for several years, in endeavoring to get every class of Indians in the United States upon reservations, in order to civilize them in that way; to get them upon reservations, so they shall not be able to go forth to hunt anything whatever.

As a matter of fact, every man knows the range of the buffalo has grown more and more confined year after year; that they have been driven westward before advancing civilization.

In my boyhood the buffalo ranged this side of the Mississippi. They have been driven before the advance of civilization and settlement, until now they range from Mexico to the British possessions around the Saskatchewan, merely passing through our territory up and down once, twice, or three or four times a year, having no abiding place in our territory. There is no place in the United States territories where the buffalo are anything else to-day but migratory herds. Why should we protect them for the Indians? Why should we deprive the settler of the right to kill the buffalo wherever he may be killed? Why should we deprive the hunter, as these animals of passage pass up and down through our land, of the privilege of capturing them for their hides as robes for the American people—a necessary use to us in the northern climates of the United States?

The game laws were established in England after the Norman conquest. They were enforced rigidly by the Normans. But there was no law which gave the native inhabitants of the soil, the Britons or Saxons, the right to kill an animal there. The game laws were established for the benefit of the conqueror alone. We, on the other hand, propose to pass a universal game law in the United States for the benefit of the Indian and the Indian alone, shutting off the settlers, the pioneers, those who, perhaps, may be starving there; making it a penal offense for the poor settler to kill a buffalo cow for food under the penalty of $100. I am not one of those who would extend that cold, merciless treatment to the settlers who go upon our frontier and settle the territories of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I look upon this law as utterly useless. There is no law that Congress can pass that will prevent the buffalo disappearing before the march of civilization. They never approach settlements. Along the lines of our railroads, where settlements and villages are planted, they dart through between these in the night in their migrations north and south. Now, Mr. Speaker, my objection to this bill is this: that there is a privilege given to the wild, savage Indian that is not given to the poor civilized settler. My next objection is that the bill is utterly worthless in point of fact. There is no law which human hands can write, there is no law which a Congress of men can enact, that will stay the disappearance of these wild animals before civilization. They eat the grass. They trample upon the plains upon which our settlers desire to herd their cattle and their sheep. There is no mistake about that. They range over the very pastures where the settlers keep their herds of cattle and their sheep to-day. They destroy that pasture. They are as uncivilized as the Indian.

Efforts have been made for a hundred years to domesticate the buffalo and to make hybrids between the buffalo and our cattle. All such efforts have utterly failed. There is no domestic buffalo in the land to-day, after a hundred years of careful effort in that direction, except the poor, puny specimens you see in the museums, starved and drooping, as in the Lincoln Park at Chicago. And who that looks at these poor, miserable specimens of civilized buffalo will desire to see them domesticated, if that were possible, in our land?

Mr. FORT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to see this bill. I think every man who has any of the spirit of a sportsman in him must be glad to see it. I mean the real sportsmen, not the men who gallop on horses after the buffalo to shoot them down with as much sense, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] well expressed it, as a man would shoot down his mother's cow in the barn-yard. But the real sportsmen will be glad to have the game law which we have in the older States also in the Western States, not to prohibit the shooting of any class of game, but to protect them during certain periods of the year.

These men who call themselves sportsmen, but who have not the spirit of real sportsmen, go out in breeding time and kill the animals without reference to their condition, and in a short time would destroy them from off the face of the earth. Such men are not fit to have guns in their hands. The real old hunter of the West is not a man of that sort. Very few men go out to settle in the West who depend on their guns for their subsistence. Yet it is very convenient for settlers and also for parties of soldiers or emigrants to be able to come across a buffalo. I say, then, let us preserve them from wanton destruction.

Mr. NESMITH. How does the real sportsman kill the buffalo?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The real sportsman kills the buffalo when he needs it, for food or for its hide. I do not object to the way in which you shoot them at all.

Another gentleman here says that he is in favor of wiping out the buffalo, because that is the only way in which you can get the Indians upon their reservation. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] answered that theory. As well might you burn all the grass in the Indian country and around it, kill every bird, dig up every root, destroy every animal whatever, and take away from the Indian the means of living, and in that way you will, perhaps, be able to get them under your control, and be able to board them at the Fifth Avenue Hotel and civilize them to your satisfaction.

I am in favor of this law, and hope it will pass. The Indian does not wantonly destroy the buffalo. He kills them for their meat and for their hides, but he does not slaughter them indiscriminately, because he knows that on the buffalo he depends for his support. Sir, I object to the inhumanity of gentlemen who wish to wipe out the buffalo in order to get the Indians upon reservations.

Mr. FORT. I yield now for three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. LOWE.]

Mr. LOWE. I think there is a policy on this subject which should be adopted, if possible, and enforced by national legislation. It is not a question simply of sentiment in behalf of huntsmen, nor is it simply a matter of sentiment in behalf of the Indian. As is well known to everybody whose attention has been directed to this subject, there are still vast herds of buffaloes ranging along the western plains from the British possessions to the northern boundary of Texas. These animals are valuable for many purposes, and their utility should be made available to the people of the country.

As I understand the object of this bill it is to prevent the wanton destruction and useless extermination of the race of buffaloes. The mere hunting and killing of them for amusement ought to be prevented, and for the reason that these herds are useful for food, and their hides are useful for commerce and the arts of life. Let us, therefore, if this bill proposes a remedy in that direction, preserve them for the use not only of the Indians but of our own citizens on the frontier. In the Territories and border States there are thousands and thousands of our own citizens who hunt these animals at the proper season of the year, not simply for the purpose of amusement or destruction, but for the purpose of subsistence. I do not wish to see this cut off from them, nor do I wish to see the Indians deprived of their means of subsistence. It will not do in this age of civilization and Christianity to attempt to exterminate the Indians by starving them to death; but we wish to preserve these animals not only for the use of the Indians but for the use of our own citizens for food and subsistence, and to preserve their hides as articles of commerce, luxury, and comfort.

Mr. FORT. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I merely desire to say a word or two. The gentleman from Michigan is entirely mistaken in his effort to be the champion of the frontier settlers on the buffalo question. So far as he is concerned it seems to be only a measure to prevent elegant gentlemen, like the gentleman from Michigan, coming out there in the sporting season and killing the buffaloes that not only feed the Indians, but the settlers also, and their wives and children. In their behalf and as their representative, I decidedly object to the gentleman from Michigan pretending to represent the settlers in this respect. Many gentlemen come here from Europe who desire to visit the plains and hunt the buffalo and bring back some token to show that they have shot buffaloes; but the fact is that the value of these animals, roaming the plains, is not to the Indian, but to the settler who is compelled to subsist on the meat of the buffalo, and who desires this law passed to protect his herds, just as you would desire a law passed to protect the herds of the East if they were assailed by vandals from Europe or from some other section of the country.

Mr. FORT. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. This bill, if gentlemen will observe, applies only to the Territories, and seems to be desired by the gentlemen representing the Territories. The argument made here that it would interfere with herds of cattle and sheep has no point. Wherever settlers invade the Territories the buffalo leaves the country. The Indians only kill buffalo in the unoccupied or uninhabited Territories. The fact is that ranchmen kill the buffalo by hundreds and by thousands, and skin them, and leave their carcasses on the plains to rot. This bill seeks to prevent that, and I think it is so far a just one. Those are the only points involved in this question.

Mr. FORT. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I have no desire to say anything on this bill. But there seems to be some misconception in the minds of some of my friends here as to the position of the Secretary of the Interior on the Indian question. This bill for preventing the useless killing of buffalo seems to have led to a discussion of the Indian question somewhat. The position of the Secretary of the Interior is this: it is one forced upon him by the demands of the settlers in the Western States and Territories. His position is simply that if you would prevent collision between the whites and the Indians in that country, and civilize the Indians, you must confine them to their reservations. He has been forced by experience to this position from the fact that all the depredations committed by these Indians upon the settlers in the West have been committed by bands of hunting parties who have come down from the reservations to hunt the buffalo. Only last summer, in the State of Nebraska, eighty-odd peaceful Pawnee Indians were killed by Sioux hunting parties.

You may take it as an established fact that whenever depredations are committed upon white settlers in that country, it has been by parties of young Indians who are off on a hunt. And so long as these Indians are permitted to leave their reservations upon the pretext that they are hunting game for their support, so long, in the opinion of the Secretary, and in my opinion also, will you have depredations upon the western settlers.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. LOWE] says you never can civilize the Indians by starving them. Sir, look at your mammoth Indian appropriation bills and you will find that you are appropriating just as much, ay, even more, for these hunting or roaming Indians as you are for those who are becoming civilized and confining themselves to their reservations.

Another word upon this point. In my judgment, the great key to the solution of this Indian problem is to confine these Indians upon as small a tract of land as possible, and if possible to make it a necessity for them to learn to labor and to get a sustenance from the soil as the white man does, and not depend upon the rivers and the plains to furnish them their fish and their game. That is the reason why the Secretary of the Interior entertains this opinion. It is not out of any desire to starve the Indians into civilization, because the fact is that these very Indians who go off upon the hunt are the class who are fed most largely out of the bounty of the Government. They are necessarily fed, because they will not work so long as they can hunt, and they must be sustained. The civilized Indians—the Choctaw, the Cherokee, the Creek, the Seminole, and many other tribes I might mention—have long since abandoned the hunt, and as a consequence of such abandonment they are becoming civilized and Christianized, and preparing themselves to assume a position similar to that held and enjoyed by any citizen of this country.

I think the position of the Secretary of the Interior from that stand-point is a sound one. This bill may be a good bill, one necessary to preserve the animals from wanton destruction. But I do not believe it is necessary to preserve them in order to support and maintain and civilize the Indians. I believe that so long as these buffaloes exist it will have just the opposite effect, so long as you pursue the present Indian policy.

Mr. FORT. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] to answer some remarks made by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. CONGER. I was not aware, until the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] reproved me for speaking on this subject, but that it was competent for any gentleman on this floor to express his sentiments. And I was also not aware that the gentleman represented a Territory when he assumed that this was his particular prerogative. This bill refers only to Territories. I thought the gentleman came here under the broad seal of a State. Therefore, in regard to his remarks, I do not acknowledge the corn on that cob. [Laughter.]

I have this to say to the House, and no one will deny it, that the buffalo within the United States are as migratory as the wild goose or the wild duck that flies back and forth between the North and the South. They do not live within our borders. They are driven from there as their home, and their summer residence, and partly their winter residence, is far up on the Saskatchewan, in the British possessions. They pass down over our plains into Texas, and even into Mexico. They are mere animals of passage. There has never been a game law of any kind in the United States, or in any State, that prevented the citizens of a State from capturing, while on their passage, for food or game, any migratory bird or animal. My objection, then, to this bill is, that it will prevent the killing of the buffalo at those seasons only when they are passing from place to place, and the killing of them by the settlers, whether in Territories or States. I do not think the measure will tend at all to protect the buffalo.

Mr. McCORMICK. This bill will not prevent the killing of buffaloes for any useful purpose, but only their wanton destruction.

Mr. FORT. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS.]

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the discussion upon this bill; for it seems to me it has been already talked all to pieces. I simply desire to say that the principle sought to be incorporated in this bill is no new principle. In almost every State, I believe, especially in the old States—I know it is so in the State which I represent in part—there are laws upon the statute-book to protect at certain seasons of the year the fish in our lakes and rivers. We also have game laws, which prohibit the wanton killing of fowls or birds at certain seasons. This bill only applies the same principle to the wanton destruction of buffaloes at particular seasons. It does not prevent the killing of buffaloes for food or for their skins; but it does prevent men going into the Territories and shooting down the buffalo, simply taking their skins or horns for trophies and allowing their bodies to rot upon the plains. The bill is designed to prevent the wanton and uncalled-for destruction of these animals at certain seasons of the year; and by this means the meat of these animals will be preserved for those who may legitimately hunt buffaloes for that object. I repeat that the bill does not propose to apply any principle which is not already recognized in many States of the Union.

Mr. FORT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say one word in support of this bill, because I have had some experience as to the manner in which these buffaloes are treated by hunters. It is one of the saddest recollections of my hunting experience that I have witnessed, and in the beginning took part in, the wanton slaughter of these roamers of the plains. The buffalo is a creature of vast utility as food to the frontier settler and to the emigrant; and, strange to say, in some regions of country I have been dependent upon these animals for fuel with which to cook my food. This animal ought to be protected; and one reason in favor of such protection is the very reason that has been urged against such a measure. The buffalo being a migratory animal, passing from State to State, there is no one State that can regulate the subject; and, more than that, the evil this bill is designed to reach arises from migratory bands of men passing from region to region, and slaughtering the animals for the mere amusement that may attend the occupation. I have seen the carcasses of these animals scattered over the plains, the hunter, after shooting the buffalo, pausing but to take the tongue; and they are killed in this way at a time when their skins are utterly useless. If there is any objection to this bill, it is that it does not go far enough in preventing the slaughter of the animal at the season when its skin is of no value whatever. I have at this session introduced a bill for the protection of fur-bearing animals in another portion of the country, and on the same principle I support any bill designed to protect, against wanton destruction, a creature so useful as the buffalo.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, this bill has now been discussed at some length, and no argument has been adduced against its passage so far as I have heard, except that these buffaloes herd upon and trample down the grass on which the domestic animals of settlers feed. The gentleman who advanced this argument is mistaken. He may inquire of every man who has traversed the plains, every man who represents a Territory on this floor, and he will find that he is entirely mistaken on that point. Buffaloes are harmless animals, feeding upon the plains where no domestic animal ever goes.

The only other argument that has been adduced against the bill is that the Secretary of the Interior thinks the buffalo should all be killed off, in order that he may civilize the Indians. Shoot the buffalo, starve the Indian to death, and thereby civilize him! I would suggest that a shorter and more humane way would be to go out and shoot the Indians themselves—put an end to their existence at once, instead of starving them to death in this manner.

I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 132, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. FORT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF JOHN JENKINS.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1251) for the relief of the heirs of John Jenkins, a lieutenant in the revolutionary war; and moved that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF LIEUTENANT JAMES BARNETT.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Mrs. Matilda Barnett and others, heirs of Lieutenant James Barnett, of the Second Virginia Regiment in the continental establishment; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, approved February 14, 1871, be amended so as to read as follows: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval service of the United States, who served in the war with Great Britain of 1812, and were honorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted and drafted men: Provided, That such widows shall have been married prior to the year 1825 to an officer or enlisted or drafted man who served as aforesaid in said war, and shall not have remarried.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension less than eight dollars per month, except for the difference between the pension now received and eight dollars per month. Pensions under this act shall be at the rate of eight dollars per month, except as herein provided, when a person is receiving a pension of less than eight dollars per month, and shall be paid to the persons entitled thereto from and after the passage of this act for and during their natural lives: Provided, That widows pensioned under this act shall, if they became widows after the 14th day of February, 1871, be entitled to a pension only from the day when they became widows.

SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed upon the pension-rolls under this act, proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under the provisions of this act; and any person who shall falsely take any oath required to be taken under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of perjury. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the rolls the name of any persons when it shall appear by proof satisfactory to him that such names were put upon such pension-rolls by or through false or fraudulent representations as to the right of such persons to a pension under the provisions of this act. The loss of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of the service performed, and of an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of service, the applicant may establish the same by the testimony of two persons who served in the same company or regiment.

SEC. 4. That all applications for pensions under the act to which this is an amendment, heretofore or which may hereafter be made, shall be considered and decided as though made under this act, and all laws now in force in regard to the manner of paying pensions, and in reference to the punishment of frauds, shall be applicable to all claims under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britain, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, so far modified as to authorize the payment of claimants under this act: Provided, That the restoration and pension contemplated herein shall take effect from the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and where said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall, on proof satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior that said pensioner did not take up arms against the Government or in any manner encourage the rebels, be entitled to the arrearages of pension due said pensioner at the time of his decease. In case there is no surviving widow, then such arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the minor children of such pensioner; and in case there are no minor children, then the arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the heirs or legal representatives of such pensioner.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill; and I wish to say before the motion is put that the appropriation bills sent to the Senate are all acted on in committee there. There is now nothing sent to the Senate from the House for the Senate to act on. One of the three has passed and come back to us. The other two have been acted on and reported to the Senate, one without amendment, the fortification bill, and I have no doubt before two days the Senate will act on every appropriation bill we have sent to that body. We have now two bills in the House, and to-morrow shall have another in the House, and unless we can send over one of our bills very soon the Senate will have the right to complain the House has given them nothing to do.

We have been two weeks without any action on the legislative appropriation bill. Two days of the week are devoted to private bills—thus far almost uninterruptedly. Monday is taken up with general business, and the morning hour of the other three days is devoted to general business. There remain then but parts of Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of each week in which the Committee on Appropriations can hope to have its bills put forward. I hope the House will allow us to go on and push through our bill as rapidly as possible, so the reproach cannot be made against us we are not keeping the Senate at work on these appropriation bills. I am willing to yield for references that will not take up much time, but for no other purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from Ohio, before he yields the floor, inform us whether he proposes to extend general debate on this legislative appropriation bill, or to take it up when we go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for amendment, paragraph by paragraph?

Mr. GARFIELD. One gentleman has the floor for debate, but I do not think it best this morning to provide for any limitation of the general debate, but to let it run, hoping before the day is out the House will consent to limitation of general debate; or if not to-day, that to-morrow morning at least we may vote to limit general debate. It is my desire to proceed with the bill, paragraph by paragraph, as soon as possible, and go forward with it as rapidly as possible until we finish it.

Mr. MAYNARD. It will be recollected by the House that the currency bill was made the special order for to-morrow. Will the Chair please indicate whether, if for any reason that bill should not be reached to-morrow, it will stand as a special order from day to day until disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It will, subject only to two things—the transportation bill which precedes it as a special order, and to a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill; otherwise it excludes every other order.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] to make a report.

Mr. TREMAIN. The Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to report back a bill to amend the bankrupt law.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I call for the regular order of business. I object; I know what the proposition to be reported is.

JOSEPH ANDERSON.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 643) for the relief of Joseph Anderson, and moved that the bill and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

TIMOTHY D. CROOK.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, the papers in the case of Timothy D. Crook were re-referred to the Committee on Claims.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL GEORGE F. HARTSUFF AND OTHERS.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to communicate to this House copies of all telegrams and papers of whatever kind on file in his office relating to the case of F. W. Hurtt, late assistant quartermaster of volunteers; the resignation of N. H. McLean, late assistant adjutant-general United States Army, and the retirement of Brigadier-General George L. Hartsuff, United States Army.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. Does the pension bill reported to-day in the morning hour go over to the first morning hour for consideration in the House? Is it before the House for consideration, or is it still liable to the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold that it is too late for the point of order to be made now.

DEBT OF VIRGINIA AND WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. HEREFORD. With the permission of the House I desire to make a brief statement. At the opening of the proceedings of the House, when I was absent from my seat in attendance upon the Committee on the Public Lands, of which I am a member, a resolution, offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. THOMAS] in relation to the settlement of the debt of the State of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In that paper is embodied a "whereas" that, in my opinion, does great injustice both to the mother State and the State which I have in part the honor to represent upon this floor. It reads as follows:

> And whereas the State of West Virginia, though often and earnestly requested to do so by the State of Virginia, has neglected and refused to adjust and settle the debt aforesaid and provide for the payment of her just and equitable proportion thereof: Therefore resolved, &c.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but believe that the sentiments therein expressed are not the sentiments of the people of the State of Virginia; because it is not true that the State of West Virginia has ever, at any time, refused, nor will she at any time in the future refuse, to pay to her mother State the last farthing of every part of that debt which she is equitably bound to pay. On the contrary she, some two or three years ago, appointed a commission to meet a similar commision in the city of Richmond to adjust this very debt; and that commission, appointed on the part of my State, went to Richmond, and reported to my Legislature that they were even denied an audience.

I do not believe that the people of the State of Virginia wish to say to the world that the youngest daughter of that State is a repudiationist, which she is not. She is willing on the proper adjustment of that debt to pay the last farthing that she owes. Some say that she owes nothing. Others say that she owes a small part. What the amount may be I am not here to discuss to-day. I only wish to do the State I have the honor in part to represent justice on this floor, and to deny the charge contained in the preamble to that resolution, that she refuses to pay any part of the debt which she honestly owes. I regret the entire spirit of these resolutions. Their sole tendency is to engender bad feeling between the two States, which I deprecate. We have been friends in the past, and will be in the future.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to say one word in reply to my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] It is a question of so much interest to both States that it would be a matter for regret that any disputation should arise between the State of Virginia and her daughter, West Virginia—no, not her legitimate daughter, but a State carved from her side by the sword of usurpation.

My friend from West Virginia says that the commissioners on the part of West Virginia went to the city of Richmond, and were there denied an audience. I cannot speak officially as to that, or of my own knowledge, for I was not there. But the history of that matter, as I am informed and as is generally understood, is that the commissioners on the part of Virginia could not procure an audience with the commissioners of West Virginia unless a basis of settlement which would have brought Virginia in debt to West Virginia was first conceded. It was the official settlement Virginia desired, but which she could not get. The commissioners of West Virginia, upon a punctilio, left Richmond, and would do nothing. I admit that the State of West Virginia has nominally professed her willingness to pay her share of the public debt of Virginia, but she has accompanied that profession with a basis of settlement going back to the foundation of the government, and charging Virginia with all the improvements whenever and wherever made. They claimed that wherever a road was made in what is now Virginia, from the beginning of the government, it should be charged to the old State; that wherever a turnpike was made in East Virginia, it should be charged to the old State; that every dollar expended in East Virginia, from its first settlement at Jamestown down to this fatal separation, should be charged to the old State; and that then a balance should be struck on that basis. If this were admitted, our friends of West Virginia would not only bring the old State in debt to them, because East Virginia was settled and improvements made there long before the tide of emigration began to go West, but they would get as much money from Virginia with which to build up the State of West Virginia as would make it twice as rich as the old State itself. We have asked West Virginia to agree to a settlement of our State debt, and assume her just proportion; but she has steadily and persistently refused. We have asked her to refer the matter to arbitration—to a just arbitration by disinterested men; and still she refuses.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEREFORD. Did not we send commissioners to Richmond?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes; but they would not confer with ours. They simply "marched up the hill, and then marched down again."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] insists upon the regular order; and the question is on that gentleman's motion to suspend the rules for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. McCRARY. I supposed that I had the floor. I desire to ask the House to proceed with the special order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the position of business. The transportation bill, which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] has charge of, is the special order at half-past one o'clock each day, to the exclusion of all other orders whatever, except the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on appropriation bills. That exception having been made, the gentleman from Ohio is rightfully entitled to the floor to make that motion, which is the only motion that is properly before the House.

The question being taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the special order, being the legislative appropriation bill, there were—ayes 86, noes 54.

So the motion was agreed to.

FUNERAL OF EX-PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES, asks to be excused from service on the special committee to attend the funeral ceremonies of the late ex-President Fillmore, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, makes the same request. In place of those gentlemen, the Chair names Mr. SWANN, of Maryland, and the gentleman from the Buffalo district, now at his home, Mr. BASS.

Mr. TYNER. I also have notified the Chair that it will be impossible for me to go to Buffalo.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will indicate a substitute for the gentlema at a later hour.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on last Thursday, having obtained the floor through the kindness of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] I said that I would endeavor, when this bill came up again, to make good what I had said in January last, that the appropriations of the current fiscal year were extravagant beyond precedent, and exceeded, for the first time during my service here, even the extravagant estimates of the Department. I said that I would endeavor to prove that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was right when he asserted that to be the fact, and that he was wrong when, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] he took back what he had said upon that subject. And I said I would further show that all the balances of appropriations made for the year 1871, limited by law for the service of that year, from which the Departments are all now drawing large sums of money, are being drawn from in plain, palpable violation of law; and that every officer—I did not say so before, but I say it now—who is drawing from those balances and expending them, as a disbursing officer, is amenable to all the pains and penalties under the law of 1846 against embezzlement. I said, also, that I would look into the extravagance of the Government in other regards. I think I did enough of that in my speech on Saturday last, and shall therefore confine myself at this time to the first three propositions, which will occupy all the time allowed me.

As it has always been my habit to allow all proper questions to be put to me while I am discussing any subject, trying to answer them as best I can, I ask it as a favor that gentlemen will not interrupt me until I have had time to complete the evidence on which I rely, as it is almost impossible to make a clear and intelligent statement, which involves complicated facts and figures, if I am required to answer any question which may suggest itself to any member on any subject while I am arraying the proofs on the points at issue between the gentleman from Ohio and myself.

I want to avoid a general political discussion for once if I can, (you know how hard it is for me to do it,) and present this matter simply as if this House was a jury, selected to determine the truth of the facts presented.

When I made the statement last January that the appropriations of the last session of Congress, for the current fiscal year, were extravagant, going even beyond the exorbitant estimates of the Departments, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] became excited, if not indignant, and with an air of triumph, which was doubtless intended to silence, if not to annihilate a humble member like myself, told the House—but I had better read what he said, so that there may be no misunderstanding:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to another remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which I cannot allow to pass unchallenged. It is my purpose, when the legislative appropriation bill comes up for discussion, to go quite fully into a statement of the relations of appropriations to estimates for a series of years past; but I will only now ask the indulgence of the committee to say that the gentleman from Kentucky is wholly in error when he says that last year Congress appropriated $13,000,000, or $15,000,000, or any other sum whatever, above the aggregate estimates sent to us by the Executive Departments. I deny the truth of that statement, and am prepared to maintain that denial against all comers.

That had a chivalrous ring; it sounded like the proclamations in the old days, when the knights were entering the lists and hurling defiance against all antagonists. We will see how he came out. I tried to convince him that he had better examine the authority I had for my statements; but he paid no attention to it, as the sequel shows:

Mr. BECK. I hold now in my hand a book prepared at the Treasury Department, which shows that the appropriations amounted to $319,000,000, when the estimates amounted to only $308,000,000. Here is the book, and the gentleman can examine it for himself.

Mr. GARFIELD. Who says that the appropriations amounted to $319,000,000, and the estimates to but $308,000,000?

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Secretary of the Treasury says that the aggregate of his estimates for next year is $319,000,000.

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman turn to the final footings of the Book of Estimates?

Mr. BECK. My dear sir, I suppose you never saw this book before.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am familiar with that book.

Mr. BECK. You never saw it, or you would not talk in that way about it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am perfectly familiar with the book, and I say to gentlemen that if they will turn to the ordinary Book of Estimates, I will give them facts which will, perhaps, help to guide us all. On page 36 the Secretary of the Treasury has summed up in one column this statement: "Appropriations for the year 1874, three hundred and six millions and odd dollars." In the next column, "Estimates for 1874, three hundred and eight millions."

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury is himself on record in the book before you, printed as the first document of this session, as saying that the total estimates laid before the last Congress for the year 1874 amounted to but $308,322,256.27; and this is one of the sums from which the gentleman draws the inference that the appropriations made by Congress exceeded the estimates by some thirteen millions. I have seen this charge floating through the press; but I am surprised to hear the Secretary of the Treasury quoted as authority for it.

It is perfectly obvious from what I have read that the gentleman from Ohio intended to deny with all possible emphasis that the appropriations made at the last session of Congress amounted to $319,600,000. His questions bristled all over with denial, and he told the House in the most solemn manner that the Secretary had told us at the beginning of this session that the total estimates for this year were $308,000,000, and the appropriations $306,000,000. I want these statements thus positively made to be distinctly remembered, in order to avoid shifting of issues now. He seemed to think it was a newspaper slander on the Secretary which I had picked up, and he would not be convinced even after I read the certificate of the Secretary himself to the truth of what I had said, as I did after submitting the Secretary's own book to his inspection, as the following shows.

This book is prefaced by the following notice, made by the Secretary of the Treasury:

NOTICE.

The following appropriations made by the third session of the Forty-second Congress, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for deficiencies for previous years, including the permanent and indefinite appropriations made by that and previous Congresses, are printed for the information of those concerned. In all estimates, disbursements, accounts, vouchers, settlements, and warrants affecting or relating to any appropriation herein authorized, the titles as printed in italics shall be quoted as the appropriation out of which payment is to be made.

WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

The summary is as follows:

Third session fiscal year 1874.

Legislative	$6,636,074 61
Executive	9,888,147 42
Judicial	3,743,243 87
Foreign intercourse	1,874,515 00
Independent Treasury	499,660 00
Mints and assay offices	976,620 31
Territorial governments	280,038 57
Military establishment	36,732,025 17
Naval establishment	22,498,620 55
Indian affairs	6,468,977 44
Pensions	30,480,000 00
Public works	20,057,132 00
Rivers and harbors	6,102,900 00
Forts and fortifications	1,899,000 00
Public lands	1,982,979 59
Postal service	6,496,602 00
Miscellaneous	15,674,164 29
Total	172,290,700 82
Permanent appropriations	147,361,943 49
(Book of Estimates 1873-'74, page 158.)
	319,652,644 31
Additional for Navy in December	4,000,000 00
	323,652,644 31
Estimates for 1874	308,323,256 27
Excess	15,329,388 04

The additions only are my figures. The amount of permanent appropriations is stated as obtained at the Department.

When I read that statement in the presence of the House, the gentleman came over to my seat and again denied it. I give his language and my explanation:

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to add to his reading the line at the head of the title-page, "Treasury Department, Warrant Division." In other words, the book comprises the appropriations made by warrant.

Mr. BECK. It does not say so.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what the book is understood to be everywhere.

Mr. BECK. That is a mistake. It is a book giving the various laws making appropriations, showing every dollar of appropriation passed by Congress for the year. It does not contain appropriations paid by warrant, but appropriations made by law, whether set forth in estimates or not, and is swelled by appropriations for former years, for this District, and for other things not estimated for as current expenses by the Departments.

Notwithstanding the certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury that the book and summary set forth the appropriations made at the third session of the Forty-second Congress for the current fiscal year, and giving each bill in detail, and the amount appropriated by each, and my explanation of how it was made up, which was in every respect true, the utterly unwarranted statement of the gentleman from Ohio that it was only a book comprising the appropriations made by warrant, and was understood to be so everywhere, was accepted by the House and the country as the truth, and I was heralded to the world by the press as a slanderer of the Administration; convicted by the gentleman from Ohio of having made false charges of extravagance against the party in power. Even the leading paper in my own State, the Louisville Courier-Journal, edited by a warm personal friend, whose ability is equal to that of any journalist in the country, published as a good joke on me, that I had got hold of the wrong book, and that the gentleman from Ohio had exposed me rather unmercifully. I have never been able to obtain the floor in my own right since that time to put the matter right. I have it now, and intend to do so.

The gentleman from Ohio was perfectly aware, and he knew I was, that "appropriations made by warrant," as he chose to term it, or rather the amount drawn out of the Treasury during any fiscal year on the warrants of the disbursing officers of the Government, gave no just idea either of the actual appropriations for the year or of the expenditures for the legitimate service of the year. Knowing that, he evidently concluded that if he could either convince the House or obtain an admission from me of the truth of his statement, my assertion that $319,652,000 had been appropriated this year, while only $308,323,000 had been estimated for, would fall to the ground and be utterly disregarded. Of course he knew—as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he could not help knowing—that it was impossible, when only half the fiscal year had run, that there could be any book showing the amount drawn out or appropriated by warrant for the whole year, which does not end till June 30, 1874; but it suited his purpose at the time, and the country temporarily believed his statement, absurd and impossible as it was, rather than mine, when it was proclaimed by such high authority that $306,000,000 were all the appropriations for this year, and the estimates were over $308,000,000, and that, as the Secretary had said so to this Congress in the Book of Estimates, it was a vile slander for anybody to state anything else as true, and he pledged himself to make a full speech, which would guide the House and the country in obtaining accurate knowledge of all the facts.

Mr. GARFIELD. Unless it is entirely agreeable to the gentleman, I will not interrupt him at all with any questions. But while he is on this point, or if he has concluded it, I simply wish to know whether I understand him now to state that he was right in saying that all the appropriations made at the last session for this fiscal year were $15,500,000 in excess of all the estimates made for this fiscal year?

Mr. BECK. I said this——

Mr. GARFIELD. I simply would like to know whether he states that.

Mr. BECK. I will answer the gentleman. All the estimates for the fiscal year, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury, were $308,000,000, and the gentleman from Ohio and myself both acted upon that assumption. If he has got any private estimates in his pocket, sent in afterward, let me ask him—I do not want to be led away too far—how it is that, as he said himself, the Secretary of the Treasury is on record in the books before you, printed as the first document of this session, as saying that the total estimates laid before the last Congress, for the year 1874, amounted to but $308,000,000? That was his own assertion—that was mine Here is the Secretary's Book of Estimates for 1874 and 1875, laid before us on the 1st day of last December, after all these appropriations were passed, after all the deficiency bills were passed, after all the estimates bearing upon the last fiscal year had been sent in, for no estimates for deficiencies were sent in at this session until the other day, and they relate to the current fiscal year. There is the certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury that all the estimates for the year 1874 were $308,000,000, printed in this book furnished us now. If that is not the truth I do not know what to rely upon. They are either all the estimates, or the Secretary is trying to deceive the House by sending them to this Congress as such in his Book of Estimates, and I will read them after a while. I desire to settle the question I am now considering first.

It became apparent to the gentleman from Ohio, notwithstanding the grand flourish he made in January, that he could not stand on the assumption that I had got hold of the wrong book, or that the facts I had stated could be successfully contradicted, especially when he found that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] after the most careful investigation, had come to precisely the same conclusion as I had, the Treasury Department admitting that the appropriations exceeded the estimates, because, as they said, there were many items in the appropriations not embraced in the Book of Estimates. I had told him so in January, but he paid no attention to me. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was more successful. He said:

I hold in my hand, not the Book of Estimates, but the Treasury Department copy of every appropriation bill passed last year, and I have on the three hundred and sixth page of it a summary of the appropriations for last year, and also for this year. I went to the Department and obtained this book. I asked them to put under these appropriations the permanent appropriations for last year and this year, and here are their figures, and I give them exactly as they gave them.

The gentleman from Ohio, who had the estimate book, says that the appropriations for last year were $306,000,000, while this book says they were $319,000,000. I sent a special messenger to the Department and asked them why there was that difference. They took the appropriation bills and pointed to the appropriations that made up the difference, and that never went into the Book of Estimates. One was an item of $1,000,000 for the southern claims commission, and they pointed out a number of other items which never went into the book of the gentleman from Ohio, and that, they stated, was the reason why this book, which contains a printed copy of every appropriation bill, summed up $319,000,000, while his book only summed up $306,000,000.

That statement was a full and complete vindication of every word I had uttered in my speech last January, and a thorough refutation of all that had been so defiantly asserted by the gentleman from Ohio. He could not help feeling chagrined that his friend from Massachusetts should be so unfortunate as to follow my bad example, yet he had, reluctantly it is true, to admit the truth of what we had said. I again quote his own language:

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see how the gentleman makes up his amount of $319,000,000, as the appropriations for the current year. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] unfortunately followed the example of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who made use of the same figures a few days ago in an attempt to sustain a charge against the Committee on Appropriations, that they had brought in appropriations and that the House had made appropriations larger than the estimates sent to us. I call the attention of the committee to that point. Here, sir, in the same book which the gentleman from Massachusetts has used, and which also the gentleman from Kentucky used, is a statement of all the moneys appropriated by Congress at its last session; and they amounted to $172,290,700.82. That is the sum total, including all the regular appropriation bills, all relief bills, pension and claim bills, all bills of every sort appropriating money that were passed through the House under the lead of any committees or of any member. Now, in addition to that, the gentleman from Massachusetts, very properly, in order to find the total estimates for the year 1874, turns to the Book of Estimates for last year, which I hold in my hand, and finds that besides the sums appropriated by Congress at its last session there were estimated for under the head of permanent appropriations, for the year ending June 30, 1874, the sum of $147,361,943.49. This large sum being added to the amount of $172,290,700.82 which Congress appropriated the last session, makes $319,652,144, the sum the gentleman named.

That is precisely what I said in January, and all I said, so that he has proved it all, and verified every figure I gave, notwithstanding his indignant denial then and his profound regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] should have been unfortunate enough to have followed my example and used the same facts I had.

It will be observed that he no longer makes the charge that this is a book of appropriations by warrants, (so called,) which was his original statement. That theory had to be abandoned, and in his own statement just read he admits it is a book containing all the appropriations made by Congress at the last session, just as I had said, and just as he had emphatically denied only three weeks before.

I hardly think even he will claim that he has made his first statement good against all comers, notwithstanding it was heralded all over the country that the Committee on Appropriations and the last Congress had been slandered by me when I charged that $319,000,000 were in fact appropriated for the current fiscal year, embracing, of course, as the figures I furnished showed, the permanent appropriations. When it was proved to be so by the gentleman from Massachusetts the gentleman from Ohio had to admit the truth of every word I had said. I ask gentlemen to read the two debates, read the points made, and if the gentleman from Ohio has not squarely admitted everything that I had said then I do not understand the English language. I submit to the judgment of the House and the country, upon the facts I have presented, that I have made my first proposition good.

What is the next proposition? I had charged in January, and Mr. DAWES had proved in February, that the appropriations were for the current fiscal year in excess of those made by Congress for former years; that we were going from bad to worse in time of peace; and that retrenchment by Congress, in appropriations, was the proper remedy to be applied, and not taxation; that expenditures ought to be cut down; and that this was the place to enforce economy by legislation.

The gentleman from Ohio again came to the rescue of his Committee on Appropriations, and defended the action of the last Congress, charging that it was the addition of the sinking fund of $29,000,000, embraced in the item of $147,000,000 of permanent appropriations for the current year, which made the appropriations for the year appear larger than those for former years, in which he claimed it was not embraced. He closed with this statement:

But we have appropriated from all sources and for all purposes less money for the current fiscal year than the actual expenditures of the last year. I am quite willing to let the work of the Committee on Appropriations for the last Congress stand the comparison with former years.

In conclusion I will say, that when the legislative appropriation bill is introduced, which I hope will be to-morrow, or at furthest on Monday next, and when we come to its discussion, it is my purpose to address the House somewhat at length in regard to our expenditures and appropriations, and to propose some measures of retrenchment which can be tested by votes. I should not have troubled the House at this time, if I had not deemed it important to correct the error into which the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has fallen. I am sure he will be glad to have an opportunity to make the corrections I have indicated.

Mr. DAWES. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that I am always very glad to be corrected when anything I say needs correction. When I compared the expenditures of last year with the appropriations of this year, the gentleman insisted that the sinking fund was included in the appropriations, but not in the expenditures, of last year. I am satisfied, since his statement, that I was mistaken, and he was correct, as far as that item was concerned. I was led into the mistake by the method of book-keeping at the Treasury Department. They have not, for the last four years, separated the sinking fund from the other reduction of the public debt, and they gave me the expenditure for each year and the reduction of the public debt for that year, including the sinking fund, in separate columns, as I gave them to the House. But in the appropriations for this year the sinking fund is included. I therefore, in comparing expenditures for the last year with appropriations for this, should have either added the sinking fund to the expenditures of last year, or subtracted it from the appropriations for this year. That sum is $29,000,000, not $43,000,000. When this is done, I am happy to say that it nearly wipes out the increase of the appropriations for this year over the expenditures of last year. I am sorry it does not quite do so.

It is with these statements of the two distinguished gentlemen that I take issue. I care nothing about the mere grouping of their figures, or whether, technically, the gentleman from Massachusetts had made a mistake. I maintain that he was right in the substantial charges made by him when he proved extravagant appropriations against the last Congress, and that he was utterly wrong when he allowed the gentleman from Ohio to so far mislead him as to make him take back that statement; and I take issue with the gentleman from Ohio and his economical committee, and am quite willing to make the comparison between the work of his committee in the last Congress and that of former years, if he desires to take the responsibility on his committee. I do not place it there.

I believe he is as unfortunate in his last position as he was in his first. It must not be forgotten that by the purchase and conversion of bonds we have now at least $25,000,000 less of interest to pay than we had four years ago, therefore our total expenses ought to be diminished by that sum, with the premium thereon, as that was all gold. But waiving even that, how do the facts appear? I turn again to the official figures of the Secretary of the Treasury. If we cannot get the truth out of them, as I said before, I do not know where to look for it. Gentlemen will please examine for themselves the last Book of Estimates, Executive Document No. 5, first session of the Forty-third Congress. On page 175 they will find the following tables vouched for as being true:

Total recapitulation by titles.

Objects.	Estimates for 1875.	Estimates for 1874.
Legislative establishment	$3,961,405 62	$2,973,274 40
Executive establishment	17,805,674 90	17,129,261 90

Grand totals	319,198,736 82	308,323,256 27

Turn to page 162 of the same book and it will be found that the sinking fund of $29,000,000 is a part of the $147,361,943.49 estimated for 1874. The estimates are $308,000,000 in round numbers, and the appropriations are called $306,000,000 in another table, when we know, and it is admitted by the Secretary, and by the gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the appropriation, including the sinking fund, was in fact $319,600,000, as I have already shown.

Turn again to the Book of Estimates of the year before last, Executive Document No. 5, third session of the Forty-second Congress, page 166, and the following table will be found under the official certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury:

Recapitulations by title.

Objects.	Estimates for 1873.	Appropriations for 1873.
Legislative establishment	$3,421,812 40	$2,282,672 80

Total	301,705,036 99	299,414,428 56

Look at page 155 of the same document, and it will be found that about $29,000,000 for the sinking fund is embraced in both the estimates and appropriations for the year 1873 in the item of $154,961,237 in the estimates, and in the items of $159,600,425.16 in the appropriations. Gentlemen will not fail to observe further that the permanent appropriations for interest, sinking fund, &c., for the year 1873, were over $10,000,000 more than the same items for the current fiscal year. Yet the total appropriations for the year 1873, with all this extra interest included, amounted, as the Secretary certifies, to $299,414,428.56, or over $20,000,000 less than the appropriations for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1874. The difference is still more striking if the same test is applied to both years which the gentleman from Ohio applied to the current fiscal year in his debate with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

He showed that the $172,290,700.82 were the regular appropriations for the working machinery of the Government, and the permanent appropriations of $147,361,943.49, which made up the total expenditures of $319,652,144, ought not to be charged to expenditures made by Congress, but to the debt, interest, and sinking fund. I agree with him that that is the test of economy or extravagance in the Committee on Appropriations and of Congress. Treat the preceding fiscal year in that way, and what is the result?

Total appropriations as shown by the Secretary and furnished to Congress, five months after the year expired, are	$299, 414, 428 56
Total permanent appropriations	159, 600, 425 16
Making as ordinary expenditures	139, 814, 003 40
Against like expenses this year	172, 290, 700 82
Difference against this year	32, 476, 697 42

Go back to the Book of Estimates for the year 1872 and you will find the following tables furnished by the Secretary, showing the estimates and appropriations for that year. See page —:

Objects.	Estimates for 1872.	Appropriations for 1872.
Legislative establishment	$3, 263, 966 34	$2, 859, 855 74

Total	309, 639, 319 61	302, 759, 099 35

And on the opposite page, among the items which go to make up the amount of the permanent appropriations, will be found the following:

For interest on the public debt	$117, 469, 959
Sinking fund	29, 366, 933

Go still further back to the Book of Estimates for the year 1871, and you will find the following table, giving the estimates and expenditures for that year, as follows, on page —:

Objects.	Estimates for 1871.	Appropriations for 1871.
Legislative establishment	$2, 833, 891 40	$2, 575, 780 21
Executive establishment	21, 321, 804 00	19, 655, 856 70

Unusual and extraordinary		1, 008, 078 39
Total	328, 360, 032 62	300, 637, 086 44

While on the opposite page of the same book, among the items of appropriations making up the permanent appropriations, the following will be found:

Interest on public debt	$119, 965, 776
Sinking fund	28, 328, 749

These four years illustrate and prove what I contend for, and of course disprove the statements of the distinguished gentlemen who contend that the appropriations for the current year compare favorably with those of former years, while the figures make the fact conclusive that the sinking fund is embraced in all the estimates and all the appropriations for each of the years the Secretary says so. His friends may accuse him of false statement or fraudulent concealment of truth; I do not. The figures further show, what I charged to be true, that the appropriations for the current fiscal year is the only instance in which Congress has appropriated more money than the Departments asked for. The following table will show how the matter stands:

Appropriations for the year 1871	$300, 637, 086 44
Permanent appropriations	166, 403, 578 39
Appropriations for ordinary purposes	134, 233, 508 05
Appropriations for the year 1872	$302, 759, 099 35
Permanent appropriations	164, 181, 150 40
Appropriations for ordinary purposes	138, 577, 948 95
Appropriations for the year 1873	$299, 414, 428 56
Permanent appropriations	159, 600, 425 16
Appropriations for ordinary purposes	139, 814, 003 40
Appropriations for the year 1874	$319, 652, 644 31
Permanent appropriations	147, 361, 943 49
Appropriations for ordinary purposes	172, 290, 700 82

If these figures and tables do not sustain me and sustain all the charges of extravagance made against the present condition of things by the gentleman from Massachusetts, no argument I can make can add to the force of them; and if they do not prove that the sinking fund is embraced equally in each statement, I cannot understand how the conclusion can be avoided.

I will show presently how the gentleman from Ohio was able to create all the confusion he has succeeded in doing. By the use of other figures, taken from the book of warrants drawn upon the Treasury during any one year, for any money either in the Treasury or in the hands of the Treasurer as agent for any of the Departments of the Government, no matter whether the sums so drawn were derived from appropriations made by Congress, or from proceeds of sales of property made by the Bureaus of the War, the Navy, or the other Departments, and by discarding the appropriations made by Congress, or blending them with the proceeds of sales drawn on by the Departments during the year, and applied to pay their own accounts, about which Congress and the people know nothing, he succeeds in presenting certain aggregates, which he calls the expenditures for the years to which he refers. He had a holy horror of the book of warrants, when he thought I was using it in January. The acts of Congress and its appropriations were the only things to be considered then, as he claimed and I admitted. When he finds that I make good by the appropriations all I said, he flies to the book showing expenditures by warrants, in which all private payments by all Departments are embraced, as well as all appropriations by Congress, and in that way tries to show that the transactions of this year are not worse than those of former years. It may not be in the departmental transactions; the ships, arms, and other war material they could sell and draw on are getting scarce; but the action of Congress is getting correspondingly worse. That is what I affirm; that is what he denies; and I have taken up the yearly appropriations for ordinary expenses, which he admits is the true test of congressional extravagance, to prove it.

Even my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] got a little befogged at that point, by getting the figures in the book of warrants mixed up with the appropriations. He seemed to have forgotten the fact, that when he and I were both members of the Committee on Appropriations, he being our chairman, the act of July 12, 1870, was passed; and I take occasion to say now, that in my opinion it was the best law ever passed since I have been in Congress. It was passed under the lead of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and he deserves great credit for the part he took in it.

The following is one of its provisions:

SEC. 7. It shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, nor to involve the Government in any contract for future payment of money in excess of such appropriation.

Gentlemen will carefully bear in mind this provision of law. It is in full force now; and the distinguished gentleman on the other side will be slow to admit that any of the heads of Departments or other disbursing officers of the United States have violated its provisions in the expenditure of public money, in view of the penalties prescribed for such violation by the act of June 14, 1866, which I shall quote presently, it being also unrepealed.

I have shown by the official reports of the Secretaries of the Treasury, and I do not intend to indicate that they do not state the truth, that all the appropriations for the fiscal years 1871, 1872, and 1873 ranged from say $136,000,000 to $140,000,000 a year for the ordinary expenses of the Government. If more was spent, who spent it? By whose authority was it expended? The law of 1870 expressly prohibited any excess of expenditure over appropriations made by Congress for the fiscal year. A charge that more was expended than the amount appropriated, whether made by the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Massachusetts, is a charge that these officials are corrupt embezzlers of the public money, and ought to be in the penitentiary, instead of filling the high positions they hold. I make no such charge. If their figures are insisted upon they do.

Where do they get the figures upon which they rely? They turn to the finance report. Please recollect in the January debate how hard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] strove to make me admit, and he temporarily convinced the country, that $319,000,000, reported by the Secretary as appropriated by Congress for the year, was only the amount appropriated by warrant, as he called it. He knew, if he could get that admission from me, he would say at once that the warrants did not show anything definite about the expenditures of the year, as connected with the appropriations made by Congress, but were swelled up by all sorts of sales and accounts. Now, when driven to the wall, in order to make an exhibit to the country, which gives some plausibility to his assertions, he falls back on the expenditures by warrants; and there is the blunder my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] committed, for he too fell back on the finance report. I repeat, the gentleman from Ohio fell back upon the finance report, and finds the following figures there:

The net ordinary expenditures for 1870 were $164,000,000; for 1871, $157,000,000; for 1872, $153,000,000, and for 1873, $180,000,000. I give round numbers only. There is appended to that report this note by the Secretary, which gentlemen were careful not to read:

NOTE.—This statement is made from warrants paid by the Treasurer up to June 30, 1866, the outstanding warrants are then added, and the statement is by warrant issued from that date. The balance in the Treasury June 30, 1873, by the statement, is $159,293,673.41, from which should be deducted the amount deposited with the States, $28,101,644.91, leaving the net available balance June 30, 1873, $131,192,028.50.

The statement by warrants is very useful, as showing all money drawn from all sources, and on all accounts during a series of years, and is well known to all intelligent men to embrace many items and details not connected with congressional action. No one knows it better than the gentleman from Ohio.

It will not be denied that the law provides that it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year. Yet the warrants drawn show that they do spend more, largely more, and unless they have other funds to draw upon than those appropriated, they are willfully and deliberately violating the law by so doing. Do the gentlemen charge that upon them on this floor? They will hardly admit it, yet their figures unexplained present that charge distinctly.

I do not charge any gentleman with willful perversion of facts. Concealment to bridge over a difficulty is not much better; but I do not charge that either. I can show in a few minutes how these warrants swell expenditures.

I hold in my hand the report of the Secretary of the Navy, sent to the House a year ago in answer to a resolution introduced by myself. In accounting for the proceeds of four hundred and odd ships sold since 1865-'66, and for all the material of the Navy disposed of, he says a large portion of it was refunded into the Treasury of the United States—which means put into the hands of the Treasurer as agent for the Department—and there it was subject to draft, and was drawn upon from time to time for what they called the debts and liabilities of the Department. It is out of this money that all claims are paid, and these sums swelled the aggregate of the expenditures during the fiscal year, as warrants are drawn upon them whenever the Department wants to pay claims. It is an extremely loose system; but I cannot go into that now. I have called attention to it often before.

Take the report of the Secretary of War made to the last Congress. The House, on my motion, called upon him for information as to what had become of the war material his Department had on hand when the war closed. He answered, and showed that the Quartermaster-General's Bureau had received and spent $107,000,000 in excess of all appropriations by his warrants drawn on the Treasurer. He said all this had been used in payment of indebtedness of the Department, except $2,000,000. Of course I never charged the Department or any officer with stealing the money. My complaint was and yet is that they spent it in ways Congress knew nothing of. But it was all deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, was drawn out by warrant issued by those Departments, and applied to what they call the debts of the Departments. What I propose to show now is that the figures which these gentlemen see fit to give us as the expenditures of the year embraced not only the appropriations of the year, but embraced all payments made out of proceeds of the sales of property made by the War, Navy, and all the other Departments of the Government. That is the way these things are accounted for.

Another suggestion to make this plain. A controversy occurred some time ago about the sale of arms to the French. The matter was discussed elaborately in the Senate, and information was called for. The Secretary of the Treasury put down the expenses of the War Department at $35,000,000, and appended the following note, as his report for 1871 shows:

NOTE.—This is the net amount after deducting $8,280,000 repaid into the Treasury as proceeds of sales of ordnance. The true expenditures were $44,000,000.

These things show what are comprehended in the warrant book from which gentlemen take their figures. Will any gentleman on the other side rise on this floor and say in the face of the provisions of the law of 1870—with appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the Government for the year 1871 amounting only to $134,000,000; for the year 1872, $138,000,000; for the year 1873, $140,000,000; and for the year 1874, $172,000,000—that they had for the net ordinary expenses of the Government and for the items embraced in those appropriation bills expended each year $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 more than was appropriated? If they do, and if that is the fact, then every officer in the United States who has used that money is guilty of embezzlement, and instead of occupying his high place he ought, as I said before, if the laws are enforced, to be in one of the penitentiaries of the country. Let them make the charge, if they should enforce the law against those who violate it. I propose calling attention to the law which punishes such conduct.

Here is the act of 1866. Section 2 reads as follows:

That if any disbursing officer of the United States——

And all these Departments become disbursing officers the moment the money is placed with the Treasurer, as it is then subject to their warrant.

If any disbursing officer of the United States shall deposit any public money intrusted to him in any place or in any manner, except as authorized by law, or shall convert to his own use in any way whatever, or shall loan with or without interest, or, for any purpose not prescribed by law, shall withdraw from the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer, or any authorized depositary, or for any purpose not prescribed by law shall transfer or apply any portion of the public money intrusted to him, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged an embezzlement of the money so deposited, converted, loaned, withdrawn, transferred, or applied; and every such act is hereby declared a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment with hard labor for a term not less than one year nor more than ten years, or by a fine of not more than the amount embezzled nor less than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Such is the law. I have already read the act of 1870 which provides that it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year. I have shown—and no man can deny it—that the appropriations for the net ordinary expenses of the Government were from twenty to twenty-five millions a year less, on the average, than the gentlemen from Ohio and Massachusetts say have been expended as the net ordinary expenditures of the Government.

It is a little strange that I have to defend their own officers against their charges, by showing that the only way they can possibly be honest men is to make up the annual expenditures by warrant by the proceeds of sales of our property, which they claim the right to sell and dispose of without having any reappropriation made. If an investigation shall be ordered, that would be their defense, and the only defense they could make. And this is the way they assert their right to do so. Take the Army, for example.

An appropriation of $1,000,000,000 was made for the Army in 1865. The war closed. Nothing like that amount was needed. Large numbers of mules, horses, wagons, munitions of war of all sorts, were left on hand. They sold them. Demand was made by myself and others, "Why do you not pay this money back into the Treasury?" The answer was, "The War Department was charged with it in 1865; if we pay it back to the Treasury, and it is reappropriated again, it will be a double charge, because that $1,000,000,000 stands against us." They therefore kept it without reappropriation, to pay what they call their debts. The money was in the hands of the Treasurer, and they drew warrants on it, and those warrants as drawn went into these net ordinary expenses by warrant which these gentlemen now parade as though they were appropriations made by law, and all this is done to save Congress and its Committee on Appropriations from just charges of extravagance.

The Books of Estimates ought to tell the truth; if they do not, the gentlemen who have charge of them should be dismissed in disgrace for sending false statements to Congress in order to deceive the representatives of the people; if they tell the truth, it is beyond all question true that all my charges of extravagance, and as to the sinking fund, are sustained, as every one of the statements of appropriations and estimates which I have submitted proves my assertions. I ask gentlemen on both sides to read them when they are embodied in the RECORD.

It is absolutely certain that in each year, from 1870 up to the present time, both our appropriations and the estimates contain the sinking fund; contain all the interest; contain every item that is included in the appropriations or the estimates for each fiscal year; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, as I have already said, did wrong when he took back what he had said about the great expenses of this year as compared with others, at the request of, or rather under the clamor raised by, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He was glad to do it; of course he was. It was right that he should be, if there was any loop-hole to be found whereby to shield his party from such glaring and extravagant appropriations and expenditures, for he showed that the expenditures for this year would exceed $321,000,000, even though the interest on the public debt has been reduced nearly if not quite $30,000,000, when expenditures ought to be at least that much less every year; and yet every year we see them swelling enormously, as the gentlemen, it seems to me, must know, from the exhibits they have themselves been compelled to make, although the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] had a few weeks before put me down by bold assertion, and it had gone to the country that I had got hold of the wrong book, and that there were no such appropriations as I showed. Perhaps he thought he could silence the gentleman from Massachusetts, who would gladly be silenced in order to shield the party, and once more the papers have taken it up and have shown how the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was slandering his own party, and how the gentleman from Ohio was again the hero of the day, when the facts show, and the Books of Estimates show, and the appropriations show, when we trace the matter year by year, that the original statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in all its substantial ideas, was true—certainly that the appropriations this year for ordinary purposes were largely in excess of the appropriations made for any former year; and that they will be all spent, and deficiencies called for besides. In this all agree, that the net ordinary appropriations and expenditures, and not the permanent appropriations, are the only true tests of extravagant legislation by Congress.

Mr. DAWES. Will my friend from Kentucky yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the gentleman to say that the gentleman from Ohio had silenced me because I was glad to be silenced in the interest of my party.

Mr. BECK. If I used the word "because," it was wrong. What I intended to say was, I had no doubt the gentleman was very glad to be silenced, and it was very proper that he should be if he could, for the good of his party. I take back the "because."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky does not quite do me justice in that respect, nor does he do the gentleman from Ohio justice, or else I suffer a good deal unreasonably. I admitted upon the floor of the House that the gentleman from Ohio was correct. I have since examined the figures, and I am still of opinion that the gentleman from Ohio was correct, with this exception, that he accidentally stated the sinking fund to be $43,000,000, when in point of fact it was $29,000,000. With that exception, I am still of opinion, after a careful revision of all his figures, that the gentleman from Ohio was correct in saying this, that in my comparison of the expenditures year after year I stated them correctly; but when I came to the appropriations of this year—not the expenditures of this year, because the year had not ended—I did not include the sinking fund in past years, although it was included in the appropriations for this year. I was glad to be corrected to that extent, wherever I was mistaken. I was desirous of being absolutely correct and accurate. And if I had done injustice anywhere, I was very glad to be corrected.

Mr. BECK. I have but about twelve minutes left.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of the Whole will not take out of the gentleman's time that which I may occupy.

While I was glad to be corrected there, I do not think the gentleman from Ohio is correct in his other statement in reference to his comparison of the expenditures from year to year. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is correct in that respect. While I would be glad to have it otherwise, I insist upon it that the figures bear out the gentleman from Kentucky in his comparison of the expenditures, while they do not bear me out in reference to excluding that single item of the sinking fund from the appropriations.

Mr. BECK. We will put them all in the RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How about the express business of the Post-Office?

Mr. DAWES. So far as I know, I was absolutely accurate about that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is, about that bolt?

Mr. DAWES. My colleague and I are not to be drawn into a controversy at this time. I got up to make a correction between the gentleman from Kentucky and myself. I know of nothing in the speech I made the other day that needs correction as it stands to-day; I adhere to that speech as it stands to-day. I gladly made a correction before I closed the speech, which is in the speech as printed, because I believed then, and on further examination of it I am confirmed in that belief, that the gentleman from Ohio, to that extent, was accurate.

Mr. BECK. In the few minutes I have left, I have two or three other things to say.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made a great speech in 1872, in which he said—for he is always promising and prophesying economy, which is, unfortunately, never realized:

> I know it is not safe to attempt to forecast the future, but I venture to express the belief that, if peace continues, the year 1876 will witness our ordinary expenditures, exclusive of the public debt, reduced to $125,000,000.

That means for the next fiscal year. Yet the estimates sent to us for 1875 are $200,000,000, or very near it. He goes on to say:

> The interest on our public debt reduced to $95,000,000; making our total expenditures, exclusive of payment on the principal of the public debt, $230,000,000. Judging from the experience of our own and of other nations, we may not hope thereafter to reach a lower figure.

And then he gives, also, the following figures, showing the reduction of yearly interest:

July 31, 1865, (maximum.)	$151, 832, 651
March 1, 1869	126, 389, 550
March 1, 1871	114, 852, 089
July 1, 1871	111, 439, 385
July 1, 1872	109, 223, 622

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] was still more lavish in his promises. He said:

> The expenditure has been so well kept in hand that to-day it is but $120,000,000, including both the War and Navy Departments. Now, sir, that is to be reduced. That figure, low as it is compared with what it was five years ago, is, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said, to be brought still lower. The rule has been established, and there has been no year since the present Administration came in during which the expenditure has not been cut down, and the Committee on Appropriations, by its present report, shows that it can be still further reduced. This reduction is to go on, and I believe the lowest figure may perhaps be reached a year or two earlier than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has stated.

Another member of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. SARGENT, of California, said about the last Indian appropriations:

> The amount appropriated for all purposes, including deficiencies, for the Indian service during the fiscal year, was $6,362,062.91. The bill which the Committee on Appropriations have instructed me to report for the present year appropriates $5,379,365.05; making a reduction of $982,697.86, or nearly one million dollars.

Yet the Secretary of the Treasury shows in his last report to Congress that, instead of the Indian expenditures being $5,300,000, they will exceed $8,500,000, for the current fiscal year.

These are merely specimens of promises made before election. We know to our sorrow how they are disregarded.

A few words on another very important question, to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole. It is to the wrongful, and, I may properly say fraudulent way in which the Departments are using money that belongs to the people, drawing it out of the Treasury every day, in palpable violation of law, to keep down the appearance of deficiencies. First, let me read the sections of the law. Sections 5 and 6 of the act of July 12, 1870, provide:

> SEC. 5. That all balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills, and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year, or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year; and such balances not needed for the said purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund: Provided, That this section shall not apply to appropriations known as permanent or indefinite appropriations.
> SEC. 6. That all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury, without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law, shall be reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Auditor of the Treasury whose duty it is to settle accounts thereunder, and the Auditor shall examine the books of his office, and certify to the Secretary whether such balances will be required in the settlement of any accounts pending in his office; and if it shall appear that such balances will not be required for this purpose, then the Secretary may include such balances in his warrant, whether the head of the proper Department shall have certified that it may be carried into the general Treasury or not. But no appropriation for the payment of the interest or principal of the public debt, or to which Congress may have given a longer duration of law, shall be thus treated.
> SEC. 7. That it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or to involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

Under these provisions, it seems to me very plain that all unexpended balances for the service of any fiscal year should be covered into the Treasury at the end of two years. The last Book of Estimates, Appendix B, contains a statement showing the balances of appropriations in the Treasury on the 1st day of July, 1873, made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, limited by law to the payment of indebtedness and payments for that year. The two years required by law had certainly expired on June 30, 1873. They amount to over $52,000,000. Yet the Secretary shows in the last Book of Estimates that, in the face of the law I have read, and in utter disregard of its provisions, these balances are still kept out of the Treasury, and are being drawn upon every day by the heads of the Bureaus and Departments. And he further reports that up to the 30th of September, 1873, about $1,050,000 had been so withdrawn from these balances, $500,000 of which were drawn by the Post-Office Department during the first three months of the current year.

I cannot conceive how Congress, if it has any decent respect for law or its own rights or authority over the public money left, can for a moment wink at such conduct or permit it to continue. If that is allowed, Congress might as well transfer its power over taxation and appropriations to the Executive Departments of the Government and tell them to do with the money of the people as they see fit. Surely we should try and correct this flagrant abuse.

I introduced some ten days ago a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to tell us what amount of these balances made for the year 1871, which ought now to be in the Treasury, but are wrongfully kept out of it, have been drawn out and expended since September last. The Committee on Appropriations have not thought it worth while even to report back that resolution. I hope they will do so. The Departments are, of course, drawing upon those balances every day, although there is not a fair-minded man in the country who, reading the law, will not say that at the end of two years the Departments had no more right to draw upon that money than they have to put their hands into my pocket and take out what I have there. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] explains that the claim of the Departments is, that if in the course of the two years they draw upon these balances, for no matter how small an amount, the balance continues available, and, if drawn upon in this way during each successive term of two years, they may be continued subject to draft indefinitely. But the provision of the law is, that these appropriations shall be covered into the Treasury two years after the appropriation made by law. The Congress of the United States makes the appropriation by law. No executive officer can make a law, or an appropriation by law; it was to prevent the possibility of such construction that the act of 1870 was passed. It is because executive officers are undertaking to make laws, are defying the law-making power, as well as the judicial authority of the Government, that this country is on the down grade leading into the frightful chasm of corruption and extravagance. It was to guard against just such conduct on the part of executive officers, as I said, that the laws were passed requiring money appropriated but not needed to be paid into the Treasury, and declaring it embezzlement to take any money from the Treasury of the United States except in accordance with law. The Departments are wholly disregarding these laws; and as they are doing it to keep down deficiency bills, so that the expenditures of their Departments shall not properly appear on the records against them, this House and the Committee on Appropriations seem determined to countenance their acts. Of course every usurpation thus winked at encourages them and urges them on to others.

The resolution I offered and had referred was as follows; it ought to be reported back and passed at once:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House what portion of the balances of appropriations remaining in the Treasury July 1, 1873, made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, limited by law to the payment of indebtedness incurred during the year for which they were made, has been drawn during the current fiscal year by any of the Departments of the Government, or any of the Bureaus thereof, stating specifically from what items of said balances of appropriation the amounts have been drawn, and the purpose to which the money so drawn has been applied, so far as the records in his Department exhibit said purpose.

As a specimen of how these things operate, I cannot do better than remind the House of the legislation which rendered possible the consummation of the contracts reported to us the other day by the Secretary of the Treasury, made by him with a man by the name of Sanborn, and with others. I regret to say that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] managed the appropriation bill before the House containing the provision which has been construed to authorize them, and put it through. I have his speech here. In the record he represented it as harmless, if properly executed, and the House voted for the passage of the law. Yet under it Sanborn and two other men got control of the Treasury, demoralized all the internal-revenue service, and are to-day issuing letters of marque and reprisal against men all over the country. That is a specimen of the way executive officers usurp power when they can. Look at the report, and see also the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, protesting as far as he dared. Out of these things from which they are now collecting, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the year 1872 collected $19,000,000 through his ordinary collectors, and for the year 1873 $6,300,000. Yet the Secretary of the Treasury has so construed the law as to put into the hands of Sanborn and his associates the management of all this business, giving them 50 per cent. of all they can collect, and requiring all the internal-revenue officers of the United States to report to them in all such cases as they point out, or embrace in the drag-net they have spread, thus suspending the regular operations of those officers who would attend to the collection of our revenues for 10 per cent. Such proceedings carried on by the executive officers of the Government furnish only another evidence of the reckless disregard of law characteristic of the present Administration. As such I refer to it; its enormities will be exposed hereafter.

One other thing. I have given notice, and now give it again, that I shall endeavor (next Monday I shall make the effort, as the Committee on Appropriations does not deem it proper to do so) to so suspend the rules as to make it in order to offer an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill striking out in the sixth section of the act of July, 1870, the words "without being drawn against in settlement of accounts;" so that it may be put beyond the power even of departmental construction to take these large balances out of the Treasury.

The Committee on Appropriations in 1870, in framing that legislation, and Congress in passing it, thought that they had closed the door against the Departments taking the money of the people beyond all peradventure. It seems almost impossible to do it. It has been the constant struggle of the Departments to escape the prohibitions and safeguards of that law. They have succeeded to a limited extent—always, allow me to say, against my protest, and always, I believe, against the protest of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Sir, the Secretary of the Treasury is before us now trying to have that provision nullified, so far as public works are concerned. (See Executive Document No. 146.) Mr. Mullett, the Supervising Architect, also insists that the law shall not apply to any of his operations, and the argument is that it had been repealed so far as it applied to the lighthouses. On the strength of that he insists that he ought to be relieved from the operation of the law. From the day the law was enacted every executive officer has been denouncing it and complaining of those who took part in its enactment. A constant struggle has been necessary on the part of those who want to keep public money in the Treasury to prevent this law from being swept away. It has been evaded, as we now see but too plainly, by a construction which no fair-minded man can give; and it is no answer to say that this construction had been formerly sustained by any departmental or executive officer. Whatever may have been the rule of construction before, we put into the law the requirement that these appropriations should not be available two years after they were created "by law," the object being to preclude the very construction now adopted by the Departments, that appropriations could be made by warrant drawn by an executive officer. Yet, as I said, the Departments are still spending these balances. As appears from the official statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, over $1,000,000 were expended during the first three months of the present fiscal year, more than two years after the expiration of the year 1871, for which the money was appropriated definitely and exclusively. There is now kept out of the Treasury, as the Book of Estimates shows, and as the gentleman from Massachusetts showed, $72,000,000 of those balances for various years which ought to be in the Treasury, obtained from former appropriations. They are now kept floating by the Departments, liable to be taken and misappropriated by the officers of the Department who have the money under their control. Yet we cannot even get information upon the subject; the Committee on Appropriations so far have failed even to report a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to tell us what has been done with them. Is it not clearly not only my right, but my duty, to complain when such a state of things exists, and to expose as well as I may the monstrous wrong which is being done, so that other members may look into it and aid me in breaking it up? The balances for 1871 alone, which are now held on to with a grip which Congress alone can loosen, amount to over $52,000,000. Surely it is worth the attention of Congress to prevent the further robbery of the people out of this vast sum.

I see that my hour is about to expire. I think I have made good what I said. I have shown, notwithstanding the denials of the gentleman from Ohio, that $319,000,000 were appropriated for the current fiscal year; that the Book of Estimates furnished to Congress shows that the estimates were $308,000,000; that the ordinary appropriations for this year, which determine extravagance in expenditure, are nearly $30,000,000 more than they were for the year 1872; that they have increased every year from 1871 to this time. I have shown that in all the appropriations and in all the estimates, the sinking fund, interest, and every item that is in the appropriations for this year, were included. I think I have shown—if I have not, a reading of the law will satisfy any gentleman upon the point—that the $72,000,000 of balances now held by the Departments, claimed by them to be subject to be drawn upon without consulting Congress, or saying, "By your leave," cannot be so drawn except in violation of law; and that every official who takes one dollar of that money out of the Treasury, as the Departments are doing now, comes under the penalties of the embezzlement act.

I have only time to say that Congress owes it to itself to put down the constant attempts on the part of the executive officers to use the money of the people without coming to the representatives of the people or going to the courts of the country for authority to do so. Until that is done you can have no honest administration, you can have no economy in the management of the affairs of the Government, you will be overwhelmed, and all honest efforts thwarted by secret rings who have influence, as they call it, with the heads of Departments, and their retainers, who do as they please in secret, without calling upon either Congress or the courts for their sanction in the expenditure of money. It was to get rid of this state of things that the law of 1870 was passed. I want that law retained upon the statute-book, and all its provisions rigidly enforced. If that is done, and not otherwise, honest administration is possible. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] showed conclusively in one of his tables the other day, if anything were needed further to prove what I have stated, that all ordinary expenditures are rapidly increasing to an alarming extent. The items for the Post-Office, for Indian affairs, for naval affairs, for the Coast Survey, judiciary, sub-treasury, and miscellaneous purposes, &c., prove that the total expenditures for these branches of the service in 1868 were $97,000,000, while for this year they were $135,000,000. I give the table itself, as follows:

Summary and comparative statement of expenditures in the several branches of the public service named from 1868 to 1873, inclusive.

Branch of service.	1868.	1873.
Post-Office	$22, 730, 592	$29, 084, 945
Indians	3, 988, 353	7, 951, 704
Naval	16, 288, 244	18, 296, 733
Coast Survey	455, 700	852, 828
Survey of public lands	373, 252	1, 128, 060
Surveyor-generals' offices	95, 209	414, 135
Judiciary	723, 378	3, 826, 131
Sub-treasury	260, 113	493, 661
Miscellaneous	53, 009, 867	73, 328, 110
Total	97, 924, 708	135, 376, 307

If I had time I could show how, by legislation, Congress has taken the money of the people and paid $400,000,000 of bonds in gold, at a frightful sacrifice, it is true, cutting down our payment of interest while the appropriations are going up instead of being reduced. Before the hammer falls allow me merely to repeat that while debt and interest have been reduced, the ordinary expenses in every other Department of the Government, the War and Navy, the Treasury, the Interior, Post-Office, indeed all other Departments, have gone up. These things have gone from bad to worse year after year, until now, in time of peace, the ordinary appropriations, all of which are spent, have reached the frightful sum of $172,000,000, as against about $134,000,000 in 1871, and $139,000,000 in 1872, and $140,000,000 in 1873.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER. I yield my time to the gentleman from Massachussetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in the general debate on this legislative appropriation bill, but there are one or two matters, accusations, which have gone to the country in the impassioned speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] which I think should carry their antidote with them.

The first is an accusation against the Secretary of the Treasury that he has allowed drafts of money from the Treasury without warrant of law; and not only that, but in exact contravention of law. If that were so, and I really believed it, I would introduce a resolution for his impeachment to-morrow. But I think the learned gentleman has overlooked one or two considerations in that regard, which will be a perfect answer to his indictment.

I agree that moneys appropriated by law, after the time when they were to be covered into the Treasury by law, have been drawn out. That is the fact. Was that in contravention of law? If I understand it, and I think I do, this is an exact answer to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky: When we appropriate money here for any governmental purpose which may extend over a year—it may be the contract under which it is to be spent cannot be finished in two years or three years; therefore the contract is made for the work to go on, and the money is set apart to answer that contract, and it is only paid so far and so fast as the contract is fulfilled and the work done. Would he have, in order to have a public building which will take three years in erection, and for which $2,000,000 is appropriated—would the gentleman from Kentucky have that money taken out of the Treasury in advance of putting up the building and paid to the contractor, so as to save its being covered into the Treasury, or would he have it set apart in the Treasury and paid as fast as the work progresses and the contract is finished? That is the whole of it; and that is provided for by law which applies to annual appropriations only. It is a legitimate action of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in my judgment in exact accordance with law, without which the business of the Government could not be carried on for an hour. Let us see.

Congress appropriates, for example, $2,000,000 to erect a public building. It will take three years to put up that building. A contract is made to erect that building in that time. The contractor goes on with a view to having the money when he finishes his work and as he does his work, and under the law, if construed otherwise than as the Secretary of the Treasury has construed it, the contractor having only obtained $1,500,000 payment for work done, the balance of the money would have to be covered back into the Treasury and the contractor left unpaid, broken up, and ruined. Now, does any body suppose that that was intended by Congress or anybody else?

And so with carrying the mails for the Post-Office Department. We appropriate so much money. A contract is made to carry the mails—a contract for four years. The contract may not be fulfilled within a year, but the money is there. What shall be done with it by the Postmaster-General? Shall he take the money out and pay the contractor before he does his work; or, shall he leave the money in the Treasury and pay him after the work is done?

It is all very plain and very correct; and I think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] cannot be in earnest in what he said about that. If he thinks—as he has said on this floor, if I understood him correctly in the heat of debate—that this money has been "fraudulently taken by the Secretary of the Treasury," he ought to bring in a bill to impeach him. And I am sure if he refers it to my committee and shows the facts, there would be one member of the committee who would vote for impeachment, though he was the dearest friend I had on earth.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I said in regard to these public buildings that the Secretary of the Treasury was now, as is shown in his own letter, Miscellaneous Document No. 146, backing the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in asking us to allow him to pay this money out of the Treasury and repeal sections 5 and 6 of the act enabling him to draw it; which shows that he does construe it as we do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is what I say. We thus allow him by law to draw it for a proper purpose. He draws it as it requires to be expended. And it is a perfectly proper administration of the Treasury.

There is another matter to which I am glad the gentleman has alluded, because it allows me to say something about it to the House and the country.

He said, if I understood him correctly, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] engineered the law of the Sanborn contract. I do not know how that may be. The gentleman from Ohio has done many a good thing in his life, and in my judgment he did not do a bad thing in this regard if he did it. I assume, for the purpose of what I mean to say, that the gentleman did urge the passage of the law.

I have seen in the public prints and elsewhere that I engineered that matter—they do me honor overmuch in saying so—that I engineered it on behalf of Mr. Sanborn; but they forgot to say that, having engineered it on behalf of Mr. Sanborn, I allowed two contracts to be made with two other parties. I am sure if I had engineered the matter for Mr. Sanborn he would have got the contract at first. I want to say here, in the face of the House and the country, that in the voluminous correspondence and mass of papers put on your desks about that contract, my name is almost the only one that does not appear there in any form. I, for one, did not know that Mr. Sanborn had the contract. I neither recommended that he should have the contract nor knew that he got it until after he had it. If he had asked me about taking the contract, I would have told him that if it was to find gold dollars in the earth and pay them into the Treasury of the United States, not to take it, because there would be envious men, malicious men, lying men, who would insist that he had done it wrongfully, and would abuse him in the newspapers, if he was sensitive at all about that, and that he never would get money enough to pay him. I might have advised him not to take it, but he did not do me the honor to ask my advice in this behalf.

Now let us see what was this law for which the whole Administration has been attacked by a corrupt press, egged on by the very men, paid by the very men, who have cheated their country out of taxes for the last four years.

In the year 1870 we passed an act repealing the taxes on legacies and successions, and on various other things, gross earnings on railroads, and various other sources of revenue. We also passed an act that there should be no more assessors; and we abolished the whole body of assessors. From that hour no taxes could be assessed upon these delinquents; and by the law no collector of internal revenue as such could collect a tax that was not returned to him by an assessor on the list given him by an assessor. And, therefore, here were these legacies and succession taxes, and these taxes upon railroads, gross earnings, and dividends, which have been kept back, and which were still kept back for four years, could not and would not be collected. The limitation for assessments and suits for penalties runs out in five years. In a very few months more the law of limitation would run against all these taxes. Now those taxes were not assessed. Those taxes were not on any revenue officer's books. Those taxes to the amount of millions were being pocketed by the whisky ring, by the railroads, and by the heirs of rich successions who were not supporting the Government, while other poor men and their legacies had been taxed to their full amount.

Under these circumstances, without any engineering of mine—or, so far as I know, of the learned chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—it was thought best to do, what? To have them collected. How? By telling the collectors to go round and hunt them up? That they neither could do nor would do. How was any portion of these taxes to be got? Why, by offering inducements to somebody to go and look them up; by offering inducements to somebody to pay the expenses of looking them up, in the interest of the country, and the honest tax-payers of the country. A law was passed allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to make a contract giving not exceeding 50 per cent. to look up these things, which were not in any office—mark now, for I want to repeat this—not on any collector's books in the United States, and which were wholly unknown to such officers. Some one would be obliged to go, in the case of legacies and succession taxes, and examine all through the court records and the revenue returns and find out who had, and who had not, paid their succession taxes. Then he would be obliged to bring suit for the taxes, unless the parties, finding their delinquencies discovered, would pay without suit.

Now, what contract did the Secretary make? First, with Mr. Kelsey, a former member of this House, and once a member of the Committee on Appropriations—an honorable man, so far as I have ever heard—and he tried to do something with them, but not having that peculiar fitness for such employment, and energy which a man must have to succeed in such things, he gave up the contract, and threw it aside, without having collected a dollar, as I am informed, and as I believe. Then it was given to a man in Philadelphia, of whom I never heard, and he tried his hand at it, and gave it up as a matter that he could make nothing of. Then Mr. Sanborn, who for years and years had been the trusted agent of Adams Express Company, and had gone all over the country in looking up their business, who had peculiar fitness and aptitude for this work, applied, as I now understand, but as I did not know at the time, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he undertook the contract. With the energy that distinguished his character, and with the skill with which he had done private business, he was enabled to discover these taxes. What was the first thing he did? He made the discovery of the names of the parties and corporations who were defaulters by going to the probate records, and by overhauling the settlements of estates in the various courts, and found the men that had not paid the taxes; also, by going and examining the railroad books, which the express business had peculiarly fitted him for, and ascertaining where the taxes had not been paid. He then came to the Secretary of the Treasury and gave a list of those whom he found owed the United States, in his judgment, and he said, "Now I have got this information, give me a contract to collect these taxes which I disclose to you for the first time, and which have lain three years dormant then, (four years now,) but, as the law is repealed, for which you will never get one dollar, and which your collectors under the law cannot collect, except as any other private individual could collect."

Mr. BECK. Allow me a single question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In a moment; just let me finish this statement.

Mr. BECK. It is not in connection with this matter.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree to that, and therefore I do not want to be interrupted at this time; I will yield to my friend in a moment; he knows that.

The question with the Secretary of the Treasury then was, "How shall I know, Mr. Sanborn, that you return all the taxes you get; you are not a bonded officer; you do not propose to give bonds?" "Well, sir," said Mr. Sanborn, "this is the way you can be certain; your collectors are bonded officers, and when I get any of these cases ready to be paid, the taxes shall be paid to your collectors of internal revenue, so that they may be returned to the Treasury; every dollar shall be returned to the Treasury, and I will not take out, or ask to take out, anything until after the moneys have been returned to the Treasury." That gave security to the Treasury that there would be no black-mailing of parties of amounts not returned, no loss of these taxes, that there would be a bonded officer to receive the money; and Mr. Sanborn said, "Ask your collectors to aid me in so much, and tell me what taxes have been paid, and I will bring the taxes to your officers ready to be paid, and then you will get the money, and I shall receive that which the law and the contract give me." A contract was given him, and then he went on and took measures by going to a party who was in default, and saying, "Your taxes amount to so much, and you will be prosecuted for them, unless you pay them," so that he might have them paid into the collector's hands, and returned to the Treasury. What happened? Why, the men who had kept back these taxes, and hoped that the five years would run out, found that they would be brought to book; the great railroads of the country, who were in default—the Erie Railroad, with half a million of these back taxes——

Mr. FOSTER. How much has been collected from the Erie Railroad?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. None yet, and I will tell you why. The Erie Railroad, owing half a million of back taxes, set the newspapers on to Mr. Sanborn in order to get the law repealed, and to make a noise in Congress so that the time might run out during which the taxes could be collected. That is the reason why there has not been any collected from that road; that is the reason why the collection stopped. And the very men whose taxes were in default, who desired to retain them in their own pocket, have been the men who are here squatted, like "the toad at the ear of Eve," poisoning the minds of Congress against this effort to collect the taxes. They say that Mr. Sanborn got too much. Mark you, he paid all expenses; nay, he takes all the abuse. Nay, more, in my judgment he has not enough to pay him; but that is his affair.

The contract was given him by a present Senator from Massachusetts, against whom there has never been, up to this time, one word breathed impugning his honesty, integrity, and the propriety of his administration of the Treasury. And yet I see him advertised in the columns of a paper, whose former proprietor did not come to such a happy end as to make it a very great inducement for anybody to follow in his footsteps—I see him advertised in that paper as "the monumental thief of the age." What is his offense? It is that he attempted to save 50 per cent. of these delinquent taxes, rather than to lose it all. In a few months more there will be no more to be collected, because the statutes of limitation will run against it and in favor of those men who do not mean to pay their taxes to the Government.

Now, I do not desire any controversy with anybody on this floor on this subject; but when it comes, let it come when it may, I will tell who are the men that are here poisoning the minds of members, from what States they come, and how much taxes they have unpaid. One member on this floor is very anxious about this matter. I should think he might be. Mr. Sanborn reports that he is behind in his taxes some thousands of dollars. I would be anxious if I were he.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. BECK. What I want to ask of the gentleman is this: whether he supposed that in the remarks I made about the Sanborn contract, characterizing it as fraudulent, I had alluded to him in any way?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means; on the contrary, I said to my friend that I thanked him for making the allusion, as it gave me an opportunity to state what I could not state otherwise.

Mr. BECK. I surely never would have connected the gentleman from Massachusetts with such contracts as I understood these to be. If there is anything on earth that seems to me apparent, it is that these contracts, from their inception to the present time, are reeking and buoyant with corruption. That is the impression upon my mind.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no idea that anybody would ever attack me that knew anything about it. The difficulty is the papers who attack me do not know anything about it. I supposed my friend did know something about it, and therefore I had not the slightest fear from him, or that he would attack me. I wanted to state to the House and to the country the facts about this contract. Perhaps I did not hear correctly what my friend from Kentucky said.

Mr. BECK. I say that, so far as the evidence furnished us seems to go, the contracts are utterly corrupt in their inception and their execution.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All right; I understand now.

Mr. BECK. The expression I used was, "reeking with corruption."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Precisely; as corrupt as was the Secretary of the Treasury in paying these balances. It is easy to say "corrupt," but if you will show me how it is corrupt to have any man called upon to pay his taxes, who had not paid them, who had kept them back for three years, and who never meant to pay them if they were not forced out of him, and then collect them and pay them into the Treasury, I will beg that man's pardon, and that of the gentleman from Kentucky too; and that will be hard enough. [Laughter.]

Now, I am not to be frightened by hard words in this matter. If any one can gainsay or contravene one single word of what I have said anywhere, on his responsibility, then I will be ready to meet him anywhere on my responsibility. I have stated to the House the exact facts which I have taken the pains to learn. The only thing I happened to know about this law was this: I had tried two years before to get a law passed to collect certain derelict and abandoned property; some large amounts of money that were in the hands of bankers in Europe, belonging to the Confederate States when they blew up, I wanted to get into the Treasury. I was opposed by gentlemen who thought it was not best to have it done, and the law failed. That was the law I undertook to "engineer" through, and I spoke of it when the committee reported this bill. I stated it substantially on this floor where I now stand; and that is all I had to do with it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems to me that the necessity for this contract business with this man Sanborn was the failure to do their duty of the officers appointed to execute this business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very likely.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Would it not have been a much easier way, a better mode, more in consonance with republican institutions and republican administration, to have removed those officers who failed to do their duty, and to place in their stead good men and true men who would have executed the law, who would have assessed and collected these taxes, and not have allowed them to be in arrears for many years, so as to necessitate any such proceeding as is contemplated under the contract with Sanborn?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman asks in effect whether it would not be best for everybody to do what he ought to do. I agree that it would. But in the next place, the difficulty was this: the putting in of new officers under the law would not give them any more power than the gentleman from Wisconsin has to collect these taxes. The law for the assessment of the taxes (I am sorry the gentleman from Wisconsin did not listen to the statement I have already made) had been repealed. A collector can collect only those taxes which are assessed, and can collect only certain specified taxes. These amounts due as taxes had been concealed—had been kept back. It was the duty of the men who owed them to make returns under oath. The assessor could not say that Mr. A owed taxes, if he kept back his returns. Thus these men escaped for the time, and would have escaped forever——

Mr. ELDREDGE. Had they not escaped by the failure of the proper officers to do their duty with reference to these very taxes?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means; at least not in every case. In some cases I have no doubt that was the fact. I do not believe that all the officers appointed under the Government are the very best men. But admit that these men owing taxes had escaped by failure of the officers to do their duty; admitting that, was it not best to have those taxes, or a portion of them, collected? That is the point. The men owing the taxes had escaped by concealments, by fraud, by wrong.

Let me give a specific case arising under the Sanborn contract. It turned out from investigation here that certain men had received large dividends on Credit Mobilier stock. Mr. Sanborn says, "I propose to collect the tax on those dividends." Those men had escaped, because nobody knew at the time anything about their holding such stock. Now, the question is whether taxes, if justly due in that way, shall not be collected? That is all.

I wish my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] when he makes his next speech, would, instead of dealing in general terms, come down to the facts and tell us where was the corruption, how it had been carried out, what was done about it. When he does so, if he can convince me that these contracts were conceived in corruption any more than that corruption which is an incident to original sin, I shall be very glad to go with him to root them out. But until he does so, I am not quite ready to denounce men generally; and whenever I may be found denouncing men generally on this floor, I want to be called to order. I only deal with individual men and with the exact facts. I say to any gentleman who has anything to say upon this subject, "Put your finger on any case, and I will examine that case with you, although it is not part of my business."

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will my friend from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I understand that the gentleman is defending the Sanborn contracts, and he wants to know where the corruption exists in those contracts. I ask him whether the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has not asserted that, in the ordinary course of the business of his Bureau, he could have collected every dollar of these taxes without any cost to the Government beyond the ordinary expenses of the Bureau?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I really do not know.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I understand that the Commissioner has said so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; if you know it, state it. I do not know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, at my instance a resolution was adopted by the House calling for copies of contracts, correspondence, and orders of the Treasury Department, in relation to what are now known as the Sanborn contracts. In response to that call we have received what is now embraced in the printed volume before me. I have also been authorized by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill to repeal the law under which these contracts have been made. I did not expect to say anything on this subject until that bill should be reported; but owing to the extraordinary statements made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] a word from me just now seems proper and fitting.

I have examined this report with considerable care; and I undertake to say here, in the face of the House and the country, that three-fourths of all the collections therein reported have been made by internal-revenue officers and by district attorneys holding office under authority of the Government. I undertake to say, further, that collections have been made over and over again in cases well known to the internal-revenue officials.

One case I may mention. A gentleman who is reported in this book as having paid a large sum has detailed to me the circumstances of that payment, which are about as follows: He owed a residuary legacy tax which had not been paid, as the amount could not be ascertained because of litigation. Some time last summer the internal-revenue officer of the proper district called upon him and asked him to settle this matter. He said, "I cannot settle it because of this litigation." "Sir," said the collector, "I will accept your statement of the amount due." He did accept the statement, and the gentleman paid the tax. The first he ever heard or saw of Mr. Sanborn was when he saw his name in this book.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts has told the House that these Sanborn contracts were made for the purpose of collecting taxes that had been kept back. To show what kind of taxes were kept back and how these kept back taxes paid, I ask the Clerk to read a letter, with which I will close my remarks.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] will give the name of the man he has referred to.

Mr. FOSTER. I prefer not to do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not like that way of doing. Let us have the name. Mr. Sanborn's name has been used enough. Let us have the name of this man, because I want to investigate that case.

Mr. FOSTER. I prefer not to give the name at present. Perhaps I may do so hereafter.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Whenever you are ready I shall be glad to have it.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE SUPERVISOR'S OFFICE,
DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, NEW JERSEY, DELAWARE, MARYLAND, AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
March 4, 1874.

SIR: I wrote to you on the 25th ultimo with reference to the efforts being made by one Belsterling, claiming to be a deputy of Treasury Agent Sanborn, to collect "legacy and succession taxes" in this city, through the aid of the district attorney, and protesting against such procedure, on the ground that all that class of taxes were in the hands of the proper revenue officers, having been placed there by myself, and would all be collected in due time without any additional expense to the Government.

Further, in reference to this subject, I would say that some two months ago I informed District Attorney McMichael that all this class of taxes were in the hands of the revenue officers, and were not proper cases for these special Treasury agents to collect. Subsequently it appears the district attorney wrote to the collectors of this city, asking what cases of legacy and succession taxes were pending in their offices and uncollected. To which both Collectors Elliot and Pollock, of the first and second districts, answered that there were none, supposing that the district attorney referred to assessments which had been made, were on their lists and not collected, apprehending that he intended commencing suit for the payment of the assessments, &c.; not thinking for a moment that he referred to cases where assessments had not as yet been made.

Both of these collectors, however, have now informed said district attorney that all the estates liable to said taxes are on record in their offices; that I had furnished them lists, giving the names of all decedents whose estates were liable, together with the names and residences of the executors and administrators. In fact, I sent to collectors' offices, procured said lists, and showed him [Mr. McMichael] on those lists every name which had been reported to him by Mr. Sanborn's deputy or agent, and I am gratified to say that Mr. McMichael at once said he would take no further action in the cases.

I deem this explanation necessary, because I understand that the letters of Collectors Elliot and Pollock, above referred to, which were written under a misapprehension, have been forwarded to the Treasury Department, and the substance of which would appear to contradict flatly the statement made in my letter to you, "that all such cases were on record in the collectors' offices."

I may further state, that I some time since directed the collectors of this city not to give Mr. Belsterling (who claims to be Mr. Sanborn's agent) any information from their records, and I have refused to do so myself. Mr. Belsterling holds no commission or appointment from the Government, and I cannot conceive that he has any authority or right to demand or receive official information from a Government officer.

Very respectfully,

ALEXANDER P. SUTTON, Supervisor.

Hon. J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Connecticut wants two or three minutes, and not desiring to cut him off, I will yield him the floor for that time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend, of course, to discuss the wisdom of the original law under which these Sanborn contracts were made, but when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was in a measure challenging any person here to bring forward a case which did not come within his description—a case in which men had withheld their taxes for three years and sought to evade them without intending ever to pay them—I thought I would, if opportunity afforded, mention to the House a case outside of his general description.

Now, sir, I do not say I will pass upon the wisdom of that law, for I have not sufficiently investigated it. I leave that to the committee which is about to report, and, I understand, to recommend the repeal of the law; but I will give a case which occurred in my district. The firm of George W. Williams & Co., State street, Hartford, Connecticut, (that is specific, and they are to be found,) is a firm of respectable and responsible druggists and manufacturers. Some two or three years ago, being about to make a very simple article, known as extract of ginger, (I would not advertise them if it were not necessary to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts)—being about to manufacture a certain article called the extract of ginger, which was not a compound or patent, but a perfectly pure and simple article, made according to directions in the pharmacopœia, went up to the internal-revenue collector's office and asked his advice whether those bottles ought to be stamped. The collector's office advised him they did not come within the letter of the law, and they need not stamp that article. They went into the manufacture for two or three years, making an honest article—as all the Connecticut manufacturers do, of course. [Laughter.] It had a large sale. Last September a young man appeared in their office—it is said in the Secretary's report that his name was Simmons.

Mr. FOSTER. That is it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No; it is not the distinguished collector of Boston, but a young man in Simmons's employ and sometimes under Sanborn, I believe. He appeared in their office, and said he had authority from the Treasury Department and wished to examine their books. They asked him for his authority, and he showed papers which seemed to vouch for the truth of his statement. They opened their books and he looked through them, and said they were indebted to the Government $2,200 and over. In the book it is $2,249. They expressed astonishment; they declared they had been advised by the officers of the internal revenue they were not taxable at all. He insisted they were, and unless they paid their tax forthwith he would take process against them and disgrace them in the eyes of Connecticut and of New England. They are responsible and worthy men, although timid, and have a high regard for their commercial reputation. They asked for delay. "How much delay will you give us?" "I will give you until to-morrow morning, at ten o'clock, to pay $2,249." They went to the collector of the district, but without laying the case before him, as they ought to have done, asked, "Is this young man a lawful agent of the Treasury Department?" They said, "Yes; he showed his papers as he came through the town." They did not wish to be disgraced, and believed they had no way to test the case. They would otherwise have taken an appeal to Commissioner Douglass. They consented, therefore, to pay, and they did pay. When a few hours afterward they came to tell a few friends about it, they were told they had been foolish, unjust to themselves, unjust to the community, and unjust to the Government; that they should have kicked the young man out and appealed to the Treasury Department for a full hearing. They paid the money, having for two or three years gone on under the advice of officers of the Internal-Revenue Department that they were not liable to be taxed on the articles they had manufactured. Now, Mr. Chairman, the law may be a just one, but the execution of it was infamous. That was black-mailing, if I know what black-mailing is.

Mr. FOSTER. And the Commissioner says the tax ought not to have been collected.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am very glad we have got one case. It turns out that an apothecary went to his friends and got private advice upon the law, and did not pay taxes upon his patent medicines, and that after this had gone on for three years he was told that if he did not pay his taxes process would be brought against him. What is that process? He would be sued. He asked, "How long will you give us to say whether we shall be sued or not?" The answer was, "Till to-morrow morning, at ten o'clock; go to your counsel and take advice." He went and took advice of his friend and of the collector and of some others, it would seem, and then he concluded to do what he was bound to do—pay the taxes or have his case brought before a jury.

Is that infamous? Where is the infamy? I fail to see it. A man goes and says, "You have not paid your taxes; either do it within a certain time or process will be brought against you." He gives him a reasonable time to choose. He chooses and pays. And if the tax is wrongfully paid, it can be returned by the Secretary of the Treasury. Is there any evidence in that book, I ask the gentleman from Ohio, that they ever made any application to have it returned? I believe not. They have not got over their scare yet. That is all I desire to say.

Here the committee informally arose, and Mr. SCOFIELD took the chair as Speaker pro tempore, to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the consent of the Senate.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire a moment to make an explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman for an explanation only, not to extend the debate.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The firm of George W. Williams & Co. did not behave in that matter with the wisdom and pluck which men usually display in my State in matters of that sort. The same game was tried with another firm.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say to the gentleman——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not yield just now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Connecticut is speaking in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has the floor by favor of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I thought the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had finished, and I asked the gentleman from Ohio to give me the floor for a moment. I understood that he did so.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. These parties might have conducted this matter with more pluck and decision. They should have gone to take the opinion of counsel that evening; and no lawyer in Hartford would have advised them to pay that. There is no lawyer familiar with the collection of revenue who would not have told them that they would have time to appeal to Washington. That they ought to have done. But they did not do that. So far as I am informed, they simply sent to the collector to ascertain if this young man was the duly authorized agent.

The question may be raised as to some other firms whether they applied for a return of the duty. This firm, George W. Williams & Co., did make due application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have the amount refunded. And this is the statement which Commissioner Douglass made to me, that in the execution of his difficult, and sometimes embarrassing, duties he does find that a firm ought to have paid a tax during a period for some time past, and have not paid it because in some cases the departments told them they need not; in others, in perfect sincerity they had gone on, not knowing that they should have paid the tax. He says that if it is found that a firm has been behaving with due respect to the law and an honest purpose, not intending to evade the law, if their conduct heretofore has been honorable and law-abiding, he does not always think it necessary to go back and hunt through their books. He thinks that such a proceeding tends to bring the revenue laws into disrepute. But he tells them, hereafter you must do what is correct. He tells me that in this case he never would have collected this back tax, but if he had come to the conclusion that the parties should pay hereafter he would have so notified them and required them to begin from that day.

It is not so much the law that I am finding fault with, but it is the manner of the execution of the law that I object to. Make the execution of your revenue laws hateful, and you oppress and exasperate honorable men. It is only the manner of the execution of the law that I am speaking of.

Mr. GARFIELD. I see that the House desires to finish the discussion of this particular matter. I therefore yield back to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] the time given to me, hoping I may get a portion of it back from the gentleman, or that I may have the floor yielded to me again.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire simply to comment on the new phase of this question, and that is, that if the collector found that men had not paid their back taxes he would not collect them. Where does he get that authority under the law? It is because of that very action of the collector, who will not collect back taxes, that we have been obliged to have these contracts. If he had not told these delinquent tax-payers, "Go and sin no more," there would have been no such necessity. Who gave the collectors their power of absolution? Where did they get the right to say, "I will not collect back taxes, nor will I look into the books of the delinquent party in order to find out whether they have paid their taxes or not?"

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The Commissioner says that is the usual policy.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; pardon me; I do not care whether the Commissioner says so or not. Taxes are to be collected honestly, fully, impartially. A man should pay all his taxes. Does the gentleman say that Mr. Sanborn's agents exacted any penalties of this firm to which he has referred? Did they take anything more than the exact taxes which were due? In this case of patent medicines, did they take one dollar more than was due, or did they demand only the honest and exact tax due to the United States. Is doing that only made the ground of complaint? I do not know but what the Commissioner may have said, as the gentleman states; if the gentleman heard him say so, I shall take it as a true report; but if the Commissioner has stated that, when he finds taxes are due to the United States, he will not collect them, it is time the President of the United States got a new Commissioner. I hold it to be the duty of revenue officers, when they find that men have held back taxes from the Government, either willfully or mistakenly, to take the taxes and penalties, if any have been incurred, and not simply to ask them to pay the taxes only which they ought to pay in the future.

Does any man in the United States wish to condone these delinquent and concealed taxes justly due the Government, while the poor man or the farmer, who cannot conceal and put his property out of sight, is oppressed by taxation? If any man has this power or wish, he ought not to be permitted to exercise it. If the patent-medicine venders of this country cannot be made to pay their just taxes on their wares, I hope the farmers will not pay theirs. Sir, I do not want to hear complaints from a patent-medicine vender that he is made to pay the just taxes due from him to the Government—taxes kept back for years, which he has not, so far as I know, even dared ask to have remitted, especially when no penalties have been demanded from the withholder. There might have been penalties exacted if he had done this willfully, but if he did it without intending wrong, then he ought at least to pay his taxes uncomplainingly, if nothing more. I am glad we have had the front of the offending of this Sanborn contract—this letter from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER]—because I know that in presenting his case he has put his best foot foremost.

Mr. FOSTER. Not yet.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman is mistaken; he does not put his worst foot foremost. What has been asserted here? First, that most of these taxes have been collected by the district attorneys and revenue officers. Well, sir, that is just what the contract provided, so that they should be collected by responsible officers of the Government. Under the Sanborn contract that was what was to be done after he had found out the delinquent cases. I said that at the very beginning, and I gave the reason why it was done: in order that there might be a responsible officer to handle the money.

Well, what is the other case—the other case which occurred in Hartford, Connecticut? An innocent patent-medicine vender, surrounded by lawyers, was called on to pay a tax on an "extract of pure ginger," and being so called on was given twelve hours to consider of it, or be sued for his taxes, and he concluded to pay it. That is here denounced as "infamous." He was simply called upon to pay his tax, that was all; and that is all there is about that case. And these are the men in whose behalf my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] says he is going to report a bill to repeal the law, in order that they may escape paying their taxes. And yet we are asked to put on more taxation, to increase the tax on friction matches, the poor man's tax, and also on tea and coffee; while the rich railroads, and patent-medicine venders, and the whisky sellers are to be allowed to keep back their taxes, and the rich legacy and succession taxes are to be withheld by the rich men's sons, whose fathers have wrung money out of the people. This is what we are called upon to allow to be done. They are to escape taxation. Is that what you want to do?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is very anxious about this matter.

Mr. DAWES. I want to protest against this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The balance of the hour belongs to the gentleman from Massachusetts who has just spoken, [Mr. BUTLER.] To whom does he yield?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield either to my colleague [Mr. DAWES] or to the other gentleman; I do not care which. I am willing to meet either or both of them.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is very anxious to have cases. Here is one on page 251 of this document, by Frank M. Green, who terms himself special State auditor of the Treasury Department, but who has I believe no appointment there. He collected $6,099.43 from the Indianapolis and Saint Louis Railroad Company. I will read what the railroad company says about their nonpayment:

> In explanation as to the delay in payment of the tax, I would say that our treasurer called on the revenue officers at this place, asking for instructions as to making up the amount due; they seemed in doubt as to amount of tax due, and said they would apply to the Department for instructions. Since which time we have held ourselves in readiness to make the payment, but as we were not called on, did not press the matter.

Frank M. Green says to the Department, "I believe the statement as to cause of delay in payment to be true." Now there were $6,000 collected from this railroad company, when the Internal-Revenue Department had full knowledge of it; and for that service Mr. John D. Sanborn gets $3,000. The whole effect of this law has been that instead of these gentlemen assisting the proper officers of the Government in the discovery and collection of taxes, the proper officers of the Government have been assisting Mr. John D. Sanborn, and have paid him $213,000 for that purpose. This was largely collected by two gentlemen—one of them, Mr. Simmons, the supervisor in Massachusetts, and another, Mr. Lucien Hawley, of New York. One of these gentlemen has been indicted, and will probably go to the penitentiary. The other has been promoted to be collector of customs at Boston. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I admire the bravery of a man who attacks an absent man. Now, then, Mr. Lucien Hawley, of Brooklyn, collected $4,000; that is all he collected out of $231,000, and they indicted him for that.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will be corrected.

Mr. FOSTER. On page 244 is a statement that Lucien Hawley collected the sum of $99,685.24, of which Mr. Sanborn gets $48,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour that originally belonged to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] and which was yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has expired.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to have four or five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Strictly speaking, the Committee of the Whole has no right to extend the time of any gentleman beyond an hour. If no objection be made, however, the Chair will permit the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will not be long.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Being upon the Committee on Appropriations, I supposed I would be entitled to the floor next. If so, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When I spoke of $4,000, for the collection of which Mr. Hawley is responsible, I spoke of legacies and succession duties. I spoke of them because he was indicted in that connection. I agree that after Mr. Sanborn gave him the notice in the case of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, the Lackawanna and Bloomsburgh Railroad Company, the Morris and Essex Railroad Company, the Utica, Chenango and Susquehanna Valley Railroad Company, the Warren Railroad Company, the Valley Railroad Company, the Oswego and Syracuse Railroad Company, and the Greene Railroad Company, Mr. Sanborn collected $99,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Hawley collected it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; no, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. Sanborn says he did.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Hawley may have received the money as collector.

Mr. FOSTER. Sanborn says he worked up the case and collected it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what Mr. Sanborn says, and he ought to be good authority.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us see exactly what Mr. Sanborn says. He says, "referring to the contract made with Mr. BOUTWELL that the railroad corporations which I have named paid to him the full amount of taxes accrued and not heretofore paid on dividends, undivided net gains, and interest on stock and loans." Then he goes on to say, "The details of the indebtedness of the above companies have been ascertained and brought into shape by Mr. Lucien Hawley, supervisor internal revenue, at my request." That is, he brought the matter into the shape in which the amounts could be ascertained, and did it at the request of Mr. Sanborn; precisely as I said before. Now, I want no better case than this. I am very glad that this case is brought up. Here were $99,000 due from these railroads for back taxes for three years, which lay neglected until the 3d of March, 1873, and in a few months more the time against them would have run out, and the people of this country would have been cheated out of $99,000. They have got $48,000. And while we are here at work squeezing the poor clerks out of their pittance of salary, paring down these little appropriations—while the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is sweating over the estimates to see where he can pare down a little here and a little there—here were $100,000 about to be run away with by these railroad companies, being their taxes upon dividends and stock, which Mr. Sanborn found out had not been returned by them. I wish we could let loose five hundred Sanborns on such rascals; and then we should not be obliged to raise a tax on the poor man's tea or coffee or matches. There are, Mr. Sanborn says, $15,000,000 of these back taxes, and he only wants to be let loose and he will collect them. That will be more than you will get out of friction matches or any such taxes. I have not a word to say on the question whether the internal-revenue officers have done their duty. Until this debate the great fact has been concealed from the House and the country that most of these taxes are four years old; and the law for their assessment has been repealed since 1870; so that the taxes can only be recovered now by being ferreted out by somebody who has energy and perseverance, and is not afraid of any whisky ring or newspaper ring.

If this House repeals this law which has put this large sum into the Treasury, and thus let loose these railroad companies and these patent-medicine venders to run away with millions of taxes, we shall then finish our work by laying a tax on the poor sewing women's tea and cutting down the pay of the female employés in the Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to apologize to the House——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think you ought to.

Mr. FOSTER. I wanted to apologize to the House for introducing here the names of absent gentlemen. But, Mr. Chairman, I think, when it is known that they are represented here by counsel, they will pardon me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To that I answer, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman either states what he knows to be true or he states that which he does not know to be true. If he knows what he states to be true, he should state it directly and fairly. I am not the attorney or of counsel for Mr. Sanborn. I have never been retained in a case by him under this contract; but I hope he will retain me when he gets after the rest of these railroad companies, to make them do justice to the Government and pay their overdue taxes. I will give him my best services in so good a cause, let me tell the gentleman from Ohio, very cheap. At one time God came down from heaven to punish misstatement with sudden death—the only occasion of the kind of which we have any such record. It was not that the man had said what was not true; he only kept back part of the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I sought the floor for the purpose of giving away my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who I believe proposes to answer some of the statements made by the gentleman from Kentucky. But as the Sanborn contracts have been discussed to-day, I want, before yielding the floor, to say a few words on that subject.

I go deeper than the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] in this, that I object to the law under which these contracts have been made and carried into force. I object not alone that the manner of executing the law is offensive, and must be so to our people, but that in its inception it was, in my view, wholly, radically, violently, wickedly wrong. I take occasion to say a word here, because when the law was passed I had the honor to be a member on this floor, and I opposed the enactment of the provision which at least put upon an appropriation bill, set these men, Sanborn and his fellows, loose on the country. I made that opposition on investigation, and after I had sought information from the then Secretary of the Treasury, who told me (and I believe he was honest and candid in his statement) that if the law, which he did not favor, should be passed, it would result in nothing; that if men came to him for authority to go over the country raking up claims for old taxes and menacing citizens with uncertain terrors if they did not pay, he believed that nothing would come of it; that while no good would come, no harm would result. I remember that I suggested to the Secretary of the Treasury that if he authorized irresponsible, greedy men (as they necessarily to a degree must be who would take this kind of contract) to go forth, and never heard from them again, while they had an offer of a large percentage if they would bring money into the Treasury, that very result would show either that they were without ground in their claims and had exaggerated their own knowledge and others' delinquency, or else that, hunting up delinquents, they had compounded with them for a sum equal to or more than what the Treasury Department would pay them. But the Secretary of the Treasury thought (and I had confidence in his judgment then, for he is a man I then respected, and now respect) that no danger would arise in that direction; and so no veto came from him on this project, and some of us, trusting to the best, voted, at last reluctantly for the provision. I opposed it with what strength I could in the debate, and have seen nothing from that day to this that has led me to think that my opposition was wrong.

I go further, sir, than the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who has found a single instance in his own State of the offensive operation of this law. He cannot fail to see that his instance is not merely an isolated case, but that it proves the inevitable offensive operation of the system. I object to it because it is not in harmony with the spirit of our institutions—the reliance of the Government upon the people, and the faith of the citizen in the Government. It is not the proper way to deal with our business interests to send out a band of men with the indorsement of the whole Treasury Department to operate in this way. I do not know who Sanborn is; I never saw him; I know nothing about him; but, be he who he may, there should be no authority given even to the three best men that might be selected in this House, or in the Senate, to collect revenues, by threat or terror, and not by regular statute process, which should be open as day.

Sir, I object to it because of another thing. It will be found in the long run that any system of spies or informers, or special agents, who receive large sums out of what they collect of arrearages of taxes or for violation of law, will in the end result in no benefit to the Treasury. That fundamentally is the answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that the Treasury has been benefited. If you give to spies or informers anywhere a large share of what they collect for violations of the law, the inevitable result is your whole regular force in the country is paralyzed. The regular force of custom-house officers and of internal-revenue officers have as their bounden duty, not only to protect the Government from violations of the law, but to keep the law from being violated. But when a band of spies or moiety seekers or informers is set up and fostered, it is for their interest, Mr. Chairman, that the law should be violated. They strike in at a time when the law has been broken, and seek to take one-eighth, or one-quarter, or one-half of what belongs to the Government, by way of penalty for a law infracted. It is not for the interest of any Sanborn that the revenue laws should not be broken. I object, further, to all this Sanborn affair, that 50 per cent. of what legitimately belonged to the Government is taken by the contractors. It is not the poor tax-payer that is relieved, but he is made to pay more money, that Sanborn and his ilk shall batten on their moieties.

One thing more. Such contracts can never be restrained and limited to good operation. An examination of the book in my hand will show, as would naturally be expected, that men procuring such a contract will aggrandize. Such a thing grows as it goes. No man can read this volume, sir, and not see the difference between the first guarded instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he suggests that it is not according to good policy that certain taxes should come within the provisions of these contracts, and his Department's position in a few weeks sanctioning the contractors' construction raking all things into their heap. If a district attorney anywhere suggests that a large sum ought not to come within the purview of the Sanborn contracts, and the Department, instead of sustaining that district attorney, upholds these men because they had grown as they went, aggrandizing in power so that at last, to read the report of the committee having the matter in charge, it looks as though the Department was being run for them and not they contributing to the Treasury Department, that was the misfortune of the Department. I do not believe it was in any way corrupt, but this connection has indisputably weakened it with the country.

I object, sir, for these fundamental reasons, to any such law as this. I bid this committee which has it in hand godspeed in their efforts to repeal it.

One thing more, Mr. Chairman. I hope this committee will go on and bring out everything they can find and report it all fearlessly. I acknowledge for one, as a member here, I was restive under the menace of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] when he stood up here and, with the audacity which characterizes him alone, told this House that if gentlemen made themselves busy on this floor in effecting the repeal of this law they would hear from him as to taxes which were due and unpaid.

I do not know whom he had in his mind, and I do not care. I was one of those unfortunates who had not enough to be much taxed so as to be behindhand. But the gentleman in that threat represents the spirit of these Sanborn contracts. It is to menace, to terrify with all that is disturbing, and all the more so for its vagueness. It is to say to men, after the fashion of despotism, "Pay, or you will suffer." He says to the House, "Keep silence, or I will assail you." I do not know, I say again, to whom the gentleman referred. I know he did not mean me, and so there is no personal matter; but I regretted to hear it. I was restive as a member of the House under that menace. I trust there is no man here who, if he is inclined to speak his mind on these Sanborn contracts, will be delayed one moment by that threat.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman I sought the floor to say to the House that in my judgment all this debate about the Sanborn contract is exceedingly premature. And I desire to express my amazement that my colleague should rush into the debate and insist on discussing the merits of the Sanborn contracts when in no way had his name been connected with them except by the public press; and as my colleague had proclaimed he was above any regard for the statements of the public press, I supposed he, in common with the rest of the House, would have been willing to wait until the Committee on Ways and Means, to whom the House had committed the matter for examination, might have made a report on the subject and the merits were legitimately before the House.

But, sir, my colleague has confessed to-day that the public press compels him to speak in his own defense. I should not if I had been in his place have hesitated to have defended myself, because I had not taken that position. But, sir, I do not think that he is exactly candid and fair in undertaking to defend the Sanborn contracts in reference to these railroads and other matters, and to invoke the prejudices of the House against the railroads in support of the contracts, when he has said they are just about becoming outlawed, and the effect of this action is to relieve them altogether. Why, sir, it is two years ago that this law was passed, when there were at least three years to collect these taxes, and the law gave nobody any new power. It clothed no officer with any power he did not have before. It only stimulated officers to a work which they have since done by farming out the revenue to them at 50 per cent. And there it lies; the whole of it lies in that single question.

Is it a matter of public policy, worthy to be maintained and defended to the country, that the only or the best method of collecting the revenues of the country is to farm them out for the percentage of 50 per cent.? These are taxes uncollected which ought to have been collected. The power of the law was sufficient to have collected them. The officers of the law had all the power before that they have now to collect them. It only lacked efficiency; that was all. That is what my colleague says lies in Mr. Sanborn, more than in all the other revenue officers of the Government, and which has been brought out into action, into full play, by the stimulus of farming out the revenue to him and telling him he shall have 50 per cent. of all he collects. That is the policy to be defended here on this floor. It is neither J. D. Sanborn nor Mr. Simmons nor anybody else. It is the proclamation to the country that the best method in which you can collect our revenues, the only manner in which you can relieve the poor man of his tax upon his tea and coffee, or the patent-medicine man of his stamps, is to give some man who has got latent energy something that will stimulate and bring out of him what is sleeping dormant there till this day, by telling him that he shall have half of all that he can collect.

I think my colleague and others might be patient enough to wait until the Committee on Ways and Means report upon the facts after a hearing of Mr. Sanborn, as he has asked to be heard in his own defense, and after the hearing of any gentleman who can either defend or otherwise throw light on these contracts. I submit to my colleague and to the House that the whole thing to be maintained and defended is a policy, and the effect of that policy upon the country, the effect of it upon the execution of the law, and the effect of it upon those upon whom the law is administered. How is it found to work? Has the experience of other nations who have farmed out their revenues been such as to justify any such policy? Is it to be proclaimed that the only way to bring fidelity and efficiency to the administration of the law is to farm out the collection of the revenue at 50 per cent. of the gross amount collected?

Now, sir, let Mr. Sanborn go. Let any just or any unjust attack on my colleague through the public press go. But let him address himself to the question of policy, and say if, with all the revenue officers you have in the country it is true that you cannot find men who will do their duty with fidelity and efficiency, except as you stimulate their energy by giving them 50 per cent. of all they can collect.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS.]

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I desire to protest against a judgment being passed on this whole subject until it shall be fully argued. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts did not desire a one-sided statement of the case to prejudge the question whether or not the law under which these Sanborn contracts were made should or should not be repealed. The question whether there has or has not been some individual misconduct under those contracts is a much smaller question than whether the whole law is not wrong, radically wrong, from the beginning.

When the Committee on Ways and Means shall be allowed to report upon this subject I venture to predict that it will be shown that the original law was passed without a fair understanding in either House of its purpose; that it was passed while in this House it had been repeatedly declared that moieties should not be paid for the collection of internal-revenue taxes. The House had distinctly voted against giving power to the Treasury to appoint revenue agents for the purpose of collecting these internal taxes. It will be shown besides, Mr. Chairman, that at the time this law was passed the Internal-Revenue Bureau was collecting these taxes—taxes of this identical class—day after day, month after month, by hundreds of thousands of dollars in the course of a year.

We are to meet the question, when a bill shall be presented for the repeal of this law, whether or not it is just and proper to set up in a free country a close corporation of contractors outside of the Government, to threaten, to make demands all over the country, and to compel the officers of the Government to assist them in their collections. Then it will be time, and then we will attempt to ask this House to say, whether this country wants money that it collects at the rate of 50 per cent.; whether, Mr. Chairman, it is wise policy for this country, on any pretext of reducing taxation, to put into the pockets of a single individual the sum of $213,000. For one I am now prepared to say that the country does not want such blood-money, that money obtained at such a price is all too dear; and when the time shall come we will be ready, I venture to say, to discuss these questions. All I desire to do now is to protest against taking judgment in advance before there can be a full hearing upon this subject.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS.]

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, I do not take the floor to discuss the policy of this contract, nor the character of the gentlemen whose names are connected with it. I wish to give to the House only a simple narrative of facts; facts, it seems to me, different from any which have yet been elicited in this discussion. I state these facts simply to enforce this conclusion, that whether it be good policy or not to farm the revenue to insure a better collection, or whether these men be or be not the best men to give the duty to, it is not right to make a contract so inconsiderately as to distribute rewards that shall be totally disproportioned to the service rendered.

Services of this nature may be rendered which would justly entitle the party rendering them to a reward equal to 50 per cent. of the amount which was recovered. But there are cases falling within this contract of a different nature. Such is a case within my own knowledge, and to which I call the attention of the House. There were no services sufficiently valuable, no labors sufficiently arduous, to warrant an extraordinary compensation; and I claim that a contract that awarded it, however good in policy, is wrong in detail, and should be amended or annulled.

Four or five years ago there died in the city of New York a man who had spent there a long life of honorable activity. His success was sufficiently marked to make him well known to his fellow-citizens. His death received notice and comment in the city press; and after his death the particulars of his will were, by the same instrumentality, spread before the public. In the will were bequests of a charitable and public nature; something, therefore, besides the ordinary curiosity of the public to impress the fact of the death of a prominent citizen and the disposition of his estate. Of this will I was made the executor. In the discharge of my duties as such I found that there were taxes to be paid which were scheduled under the two heads, "legacy" and "succession." To prepare for paying these a copy of the will was immediately filed in the office of the proper assessor. Under the law the succession tax fell due first. Accordingly, upon me as executor was served the usual notice from the assessor's office that a valuation was made, the assessment laid, and payment expected. Payment was made promptly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When was that?

Mr. PHELPS. Four or five years ago; not more than five, and, perhaps, not more than four.

After the payment of the succession tax, when the legacies were ready for distribution, I made my returns of them to the same office, and paid the legacy tax. The estate so moved toward its final settlement. The tax upon succession and the tax upon all legacies were paid except the tax upon the residuary legacy. This tax, I need not tell a House composed of so many lawyers, could not be paid until the amount of the residuum was ascertained; that amount could not be ascertained until all claims had been settled, all accounts had been closed, all lawsuits ended. Then, and not before, could executor or assessor tell the value of the residuary legacy upon which the tax should be assessed and paid. The estate was large and mixed in a variety of investments. I should judge, from my experience as a lawyer in the settlement of similar estates in the city of New York, that few have been finally closed within so brief a period as five years; and I congratulated myself last March or April that, with the exception of certain matters in litigation, my duties were practically ended, when I received from the same office notice that a residuary tax had not been paid, and asking for a return of the value of the residuary legacy, that an assessment might be made. An interview followed, in which the assessor learned to his apparent satisfaction that the estate was not yet ready for settlement, but was progressing in that direction. The interview ended with the assurance on the part of my agent, who had charge of my affairs, that he would hasten the prosecution of certain suits which delayed the settlement of the estate, and would at the earliest moment communicate the results to the assessor's office.

Nothing was heard of the matter until perhaps August or September of last year. At that time I had a personal interview with the assessor, who said that the Government was anxious that all estates of this kind should be closed, and that it would be considered a favor to the officer and to the Government if the executor would, by conjecture, estimate or otherwise fix the value of outstanding doubtful and litigated claims, add it to the amount already ascertained, and return that total as the residuary legacy—the basis for the tax.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The assessors have been abolished for some two years.

Mr. PHELPS. It was an officer of the Government; I did not know his title. I do not know whether it was the assessor or the collector. I know only that it was the same officer that I had dealt with before; or at least he was one of them, and from the same public office.

Right here, lest I may forget it, I want to say that there was no demand or threat. The interviews were brief, but always pleasant and agreeable. There was no suggestion of dereliction; there was co-operation in a desire I expressed to lump the uncertainties, close the estate, and pay the tax before it was legally due. Nothing that I recall extraordinary or different from the interviews connected with the previous returns of taxes, except the fact that the officers seemed more anxious this time that the interest of the Government would be subserved by speedy payment; and I am not sure this anxiety was so marked as to excite my comment or notice at the time. There was nothing in this final transaction—the collection and payment of the residuary tax—that was different from the collection and payment of the succession and legacy taxes. Certainly there was nothing said or done to indicate that it was other than the act of the Government. The office was the same, the printed notices were the same, and the officers were in whole or in part the same.

In this personal interview of August or September with one of them who brought the blanks of the Government to me on which to make my returns, I told him I would be very glad to close the matter and get it off my hands. I told him further if, in his opinion, it was just to the Government that I should conjecture what would be the probable result of claims disputed or litigated which were still pending, and he was willing to accept such conjecture as I might make, I would do it. Upon consultation with him and with my friends I did make such an estimate as I thought proper and fair in the case, and upon it made my return. The tax was paid soon after at my New York office. I was away, and do not know to whom. I suppose it was paid to the same collector as before, or my attention would have been called to it by my clerks. What was the amount?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can give the gentleman the amount, which is stated here. It is $14,820.

Mr. PHELPS. That would be my impression—that it was about $15,000. I supposed it had gone to the Government. I knew and suspected nothing to the contrary, until one day on the floor of this House my friend from Massachusetts now near me, said that it was in the Sanborn contracts. I had not heard of these contracts before; I had not heard of Mr. Sanborn before. My curiosity was therefore naturally great to know in what way I could have gotten into the Sanborn contracts. Upon examination I discovered that the provisions of the contract were so loosely drawn—its reach was so carelessly defined—that cases like my own, in which I submit to the House that there was no dereliction of duty, but rather an anticipation of duty, clearly and from their nature came within its terms.

I will conclude now by only calling the attention of the House to the point I made in the beginning, and which is the only one I want to make; that even if it is right to farm out the collection of the revenue by contract, the contract should not be an exorbitant one. It is not fair to give $7,000 to any contractor for merely instigating the officers of the Government to exercise ordinary energy and perseverance in a simple case like this. This tax, like its predecessors, would have been paid to the Government, there is no reason to doubt, when it became due; and the fact that it was paid sooner—before it became due—through the zeal which Mr. Sanborn put into the Government officials, is not sufficient reason for the Government to pay to Mr. Sanborn the $7,000 which our revenue has lost.

The way I feel in this matter is this: When Congress tries so hard to pare down appropriations and curtail expenses, to save the poor man from further taxation and to keep for him his free tea and his coffee; when we wrangle over the cost of his friction matches, it is too bad to give to any contractors, however honorable, however efficient, the sum of $7,000 for merely telling an officer of the Government to urge a well-known citizen to pay his taxes, when these officers had the will recorded in the office from which their notice came, when they knew the executor was responsible and could be forced ultimately to pay all that might be due to the Government.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. PHELPS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Can the gentleman tell the House what was the date of filing that will?

Mr. PHELPS. I should think it was June, 1868, or June, 1869.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And assuming the tax to have been due at the time the will was filed, when would the five years have run out?

Mr. PHELPS. But this debt or tax is not incurred, so that the statute runs until the estate is settled. Only then can the amount be ascertained upon which the tax is levied and by which the debt is as ascertained.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the limitation?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Five years, when the legacy tax becomes due.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not become due until the amount is ascertained.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When the will is proved it becomes due.

Mr. PHELPS. No, when its amount is ascertained.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no limitation against the collection of the tax; there is a limitation against the assessment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, is debate limited to the other side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The floor belongs at present to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If he yields to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] the latter will be recognized.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have promised to yield to my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, it will be impossible for me to stay long in the way of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] because I am so anxious to hear him. My only desire in seeking the floor at present is to correct a misapprehension of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I was sorry he misunderstood my remarks, as he did slightly; and as I had no opportunity at the time to correct his statement, he kindly yields me a moment now.

When previously upon the floor, I was, as I thought, careful to say that my only wish was to present a case under this law, not to go into a discussion of the law itself or the general policy of such laws. I rise now only to say that when the proper time comes, if this is not the proper time, (and we are making it such very fast)—when the proper time comes for discussing that law, I shall by speech or vote concur with those gentlemen who have most heartily denounced that law and all the practices under it. The law itself, from foundation-stone to turret, together with the whole system of moieties and Sanborn contracts from beginning to end, is, I think, from our experience, obviously demoralizing to the whole civil service, and discreditable and injurious in every way to the Government. This is all I wish to say just now.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I was a member of this House when the law now under consideration was passed, and I raised my voice as forcibly as I could against its passage. At the proper time, when the committee shall report all the facts, I think I can give the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] some cases which even he will hardly defend—cases where these officers have exercised their tyranny in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. Chairman, how was this bill forced through the House? The majority passing the bill acted in full view of a prophecy then made of the results which would follow its enactment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] at that time said in substance, and indeed almost literally, what he has stated to-day; and I, in my feeble way, as will be seen by reference to the printed debates, characterized the measure as a scheme by which designing men would practice extortion upon innocent merchants and corporations. This is just the use that has been made of this law in the city which I have the honor in part to represent.

This measure as embraced in a conference report was, after discussion, rejected in this House by a vote of 80 to 81, the conference report being rejected solely on account of this thirty-fourth amendment as it was then classified. The bill went to another conference; yet, notwithstanding that vote of the House, recruits were brought up here and the measure was subsequently passed by a vote of 87 yeas to 77 nays. I have here the report; but as I said I do not want to anticipate the discussion of this subject. I am unwilling, however, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] shall stand up here and say that nobody believes this law in its execution has been improper; for I know that in its execution it has been one of the most outrageous laws ever placed upon the statute-book, as constituents of mine—honest, upright people as any living in the State of Massachusetts—have had sorry reason to feel.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] for a moment, that he may read a single receipt.

Mr. PHELPS. I take one minute more of the time of the gentleman from Ohio, because on reading this printed copy of the Sanborn contract I find fortunately the receipt which was sent to me as executor; and I read that receipt as showing that there was not in the transaction, in its end, any more than in its beginning and progress, one thing to indicate the presence of other than governmental interest. Certainly nothing, at a time when no one had ever heard the name of Sanborn or knew him as other than a governmental official. It is signed by the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., September 12, 1873.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt, through Special Agent John D. Sanborn, of the sum of $14,820, on account of legacy and succession tax due the Government from the estate of John I. Phelps, deceased.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS,
Hackensack, New Jersey.

A MEMBER. On what page is that receipt?

Mr. PHELPS. On page 164; and on the same page I find two other cases known to myself and to which I direct the attention of the House. They involve names of much wider reach than the humble one I bear; still more easily could the Government, unaided by contractors, have found and exposed their delinquency, if there was any. One receipt here refers to the estate of William Curtis Noyes, clarum et venerabile nomen, than whom no lawyer better known throughout the country has died in New York during the last thirty years. Immediately below, on the same page, I find a receipt undoubtedly for the residuary legacy of Edmund Penfold, a man not of forensic fame or national reputation, like Mr. Noyes, but a man widely known for wealth and public spirit. I have no time to look further.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. NIBLACK. I will not interrupt the gentleman for longer than a minute.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have only fifteen or twenty minutes left out of two hours.

Mr. NIBLACK. I only desire, Mr. Chairman, and I feel it due to myself, to say this is a subject with which I have been familiar from the beginning; that is, what are now known as the Sanborn contracts; and when it comes before the House on the report of the Committee on Ways and Means for a repeal of the law I shall then seek the floor and make a statement of the history of the law itself, in reference to which I took some part. I opposed it from the beginning, and I am not at all surprised at the developments which have been seen here of its operation. I did not anticipate this debate, and am not entirely prepared for it, and therefore have not sought the floor, but will ask to be heard when it comes regularly before the House on report of the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the public expenditures has, by an incidental remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] taken in its range the so-called Sanborn contracts. I am unwilling to believe the gentleman from Kentucky weighed the force of his words and meant from his heart what he said when he introduced the subject of the Sanborn contracts. He is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. He is familiar with all that is being said and done in that committee in regard to the Sanborn contracts. I now hold in my hand a copy of the Congressional Globe, borrowed from him, with marks to indicate the legislative steps by which the moiety law, so known, became a law. I have every reason to believe the gentleman from Kentucky is perfectly familiar with all the steps which led to that law in this House and in the Senate; first, by being here at the time, and secondly, by having carefully, I have no doubt, gone over the Globe in reference to it. And yet, with a kind of excitement I am unable to explain or understand, he said—and I wrote down on a paper here as he uttered them—these astonishing words:

This moiety law was engineered through the House by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

I wrote them at the moment, that I might be sure to quote them as they were uttered by the gentleman from Kentucky. I am unwilling to impute conscious and premeditated wrong to any member; and I cannot but think in the heat and glow of his eloquence, at the end of his hour's speech, that these words flew from him like sparks from hot iron running through the rolls. I cannot doubt that he knew better.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say this: I do not know the exact language I used. I was showing to what extent executive officers are making contracts and allowing usurpations to progress under a law which at the time was passed under the lead of the gentleman from Ohio as chairman of the committee of conference, and explained by him at the time, as shown in the book I sent him, and which he assured the House could not bear any such significance as the officers of the Government have given it. My remarks were against executive usurpation, made under the law which he thought then was harmless or else he was blinded.

Mr. GARFIELD. A word as to the history of the law itself. A friend of mine a moment ago asked how is this—it seems everybody was opposed to this matter? How then came it to be a law? This is its history in brief: The proposition was brought to the Committee on Appropriations to add a clause empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to make special contracts for the collection of unpaid taxes. I went to the Secretary of the Treasury, now a distinguished Senator, and asked him whether it met his approval. I had been told he desired that put into the law; but the Secretary, in a full conversation on the subject, said there were already some laws of that sort about taking up wrecks which had been sunk in southern harbors during the war, and he showed me his books and said, "We never got a dollar from any of these things; and I do not believe in the policy, because it simply gives men power to go around and perhaps levy black-mail upon the people. I do not believe in giving people such power."

Reporting the fact to the Committee on Appropriations, that committee were unanimously against the clause. We rejected it in committee, and did not allow it to become a part of the text of the bill; it was the legislative appropriation bill, corresponding with the one now under debate. When the bill went to the Senate the rejected clause was inserted, and when the bill came back to the House and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, the committee, adhering to its former opinion, unanimously reported to the House against the clause; and on their motion it was stricken out in the House, and the bill was sent back to the Senate, and finally went to a committee of conference. The committee of conference found the Senate not only united, but strong and determined, in favor of keeping that clause in the bill. There was faithfully presented to them the argument made in the House—made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] a member of the committee; made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just spoken on the subject; made by myself—giving the reasons why we thought such a provision ought not to pass. The Senate, nevertheless, insisted that it should be kept in the bill. It was again brought into the House and attacked by members of the Committee on Appropriations, and the House voted down the conference report by one majority, and on that ground almost solely. It was again sent back to a committee of conference, and, if I remember rightly, a second conference report was voted down in the House. I am not quite positive, however, as to that. But at last, on the final conference report, which was made on the 3d day of May, I stated the objections which had been urged in the House by the Committee on Appropriations against the clause. I said to the House that the House conferees had undertaken to obviate those objections by putting into the law that no contract should be given to any man to collect taxes under this arrangement unless he filed his statement under oath, setting forth exactly what corporation, or what man, or what men, owed taxes that had not yet been paid; stating the amount that he believed to be so owed, and stating furthermore his peculiar means of knowledge and of getting hold of the facts. My words in the debate on April 29, when the first conference report was voted down, as reported in the Congressional Globe, were as follows:

No member of the Committee on Appropriations was more opposed or is more opposed to the idea of moieties than I. I was opposed to putting on the clause to which the several gentlemen have referred. We found the Senate making this statement. The Senate conferees told us they had reason to believe single corporations had covered up under the form of stock accounts and other bonds $500,000 which ought to have been paid into the Treasury as an income tax. And they had reason to believe this provision would enable the Secretary of the Treasury to secure the repayment of that sum. The Senate conferees were a unit on this subject, and notwithstanding all the representations we made, they would not give way. I do not believe a better result can be had if we vote a dozen conferences. I have no personal pride in this conference report; but I say at this stage of the session, when this report has cost five sessions of the conference committee to produce the result, I should be sorry to see it defeated on this single point. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The Globe reports me as speaking on the 3d May, on presenting the final conference report, as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there were two points especially made in the House against the Senate amendment, apart from the objections which were directed against the entire principle of the proposition. The conferees have had four sessions in reference to this question. The Senate conferees were absolutely unwilling to recede from the amendment. After all these conferences we insisted that if the proposition was to be retained at all, there should be safeguards to obviate the special objections made in the House.

The first objection was, that irresponsible persons without character might make such representations as would induce the Secretary of the Treasury to give them a contract, and that this would be the last heard from them. The amendment in its present form (as members will have noticed if they have attended to the reading) provides that no contract shall be made with any person unless he first submits a written statement under oath, of what he believes to be the amount of money or property withheld from the Government unlawfully by any person, firm, or corporation, stating also the law that he believes to be violated; and the statements are to be so specific that they may enable the Secretary of the Treasury to know where the derelict property is and its exact status.

In the next place, the amendment in its present form provides, as a protection against black-mailing, that anyperson having such contract, who shall attempt to make settlement, or who shall receive money in the way of settlement without an express written order from the Secretary of the Treasury to that effect, shall be deemed guilty of a penal offense, and shall be punished therefor.

In the third place, it is provided that frequent reports shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be made by any person thus authorized to recover property. The committee of conference believe that the proposition in its present form obviates as fully as possible the evils apprehended by members of the House who objected to the measure.

Thus, with the amendment which the House conferees insisted upon as the only condition on which they would at all tolerate the clause, it was brought in and passed. The law thus guarded, as declared in my speech on presenting the report, could not be open to some of the worst objections there were to the law.

That is the history of the case, and I know of no single act, or part of an act, that has ever been more strongly insisted on by one body and opposed by another than that clause of the legislative appropriation bill two years ago.

Now, with that simple statement of the case, I am sure the gentleman from Kentucky himself will see the gross injustice of making the statement he did in saying to the House and the country that I or any member of the Committee on Appropriations engineered this legislation.

Mr. BECK. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: Did he not, after the explanation he made as to the provisions of the law as it passed the Senate, urge the House to vote for the measure as then amended, he being chairman of the conference committee? And did he not vote for it himself on the call of the yeas and nays?

Mr. GARFIELD. I certainly voted for the conference report, as the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] as the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] who signed the conference report did, although as much opposed to it as I was. But the gentleman well knows that such action was as wide apart as the poles from the position of engineering the provision.

Mr. RANDALL. If there were two out of three opposed to it, how was it got in?

Mr. GARFIELD. Simply because when two independent legislative bodies differ sharply on a clause in a bill that must pass they cannot both have their way. One or the other must yield or lose the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The House had previously voted down the conference report which embraced that.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House had rejected the clause in its first shape, but not in its greatly restricted and modified form. If the law as it stands has been strictly followed, I do not see how any great abuse could result from it. Whenever this subject comes up in regular order on the report from the committee which has it in charge it will be time to enter more fully into the debate on its merits.

I desire now to respond to two things in the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in regard to expenditures and appropriations.

The proclamation of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] to which this House listened on Thursday last at the conclusion of my remarks, was among the most high-sounding pronunciamientos I have heard in many years. It was like the book that Hamlet spoke of, which "thundered in the index." Now that we have had the volume of the thunder-storm, it seems to me there has been a great deal less thunder in the book than there was in the index.

There are just two points of difference raised between the gentleman from Kentucky and myself, and only two. They have been discussed hitherto, and I discuss them now only to recall to the attention of the House what they are.

The first is the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky that Congress, at its last session, appropriated $15,500,000 more than all the estimates of all the Departments. I answered at the time; and to-day, after listening carefully to the gentleman's statement, I cannot, for the life of me, comprehend his logic or the basis on which he concludes that he was "right all the time," and sticks to it. Now, what is his proof? If gentlemen will listen to me for a moment, I will give them exactly his method of proof. It is this: He picks up the Book of Estimates, bearing date of December, 1873, the Book of Estimates written and published, he says, long after all the appropriations of the last Congress were made, and turning to page 176, he finds the Secretary of the Treasury saying, "estimates for 1874, $308,323,256.27."

He then says, with an air of triumph:

There I have the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury himself for saying that all the estimates for 1874 amounted to $308,000,000.

Now, the fault in his reasoning, or rather in his statement, is, that he puts in a very important little word of three letters, and that is the word "all." He makes the Secretary say in this book that all the estimates for 1874 amounted to $308,000,000. The Secretary says no such thing. Where does the Secretary get that $308,000,000? I will tell the gentleman, as I have told him twice before. Here is the Book of Estimates of last year, the book sent to us in print the first day of the session in December, 1872, and there the Secretary makes his estimates, permanent and annual, and sums them up on page 168, under this heading: "Estimates for 1874"—that is for this year—"$308,323,256.27;" and these are the very figures in millions and thousands and hundreds, in dollars and cents, which the Secretary says in his Book of Estimates for this year were the estimates for 1874, to wit, $308,323,256.27.

Now, what man of any clearness of mind, or fairness of mind, will say that the Secretary now states that all the estimates for 1874 were $308,000,000? Who does not see, who does not know, that that was what he last year estimated for in his Book of Estimates of December, 1872? And the gentleman has thrice repeated the declaration, that the Secretary says that three hundred and eight millions were all the estimates for 1874. Sheer stubbornness could go no further.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations kept a record of the additional estimates sent into the House after the Book of Estimates of last year was received. Many of them were printed by order of the House. Here they are for the inspection of any who desire to know the truth. I will give some specimens from this volume, bound last year, by the care of the Clerk, and labeled, "Additional Estimates of Appropriations." I find in it, for example, "Estimates of deficiencies," and sent in, when? January 9, 1873; sent in a month after the Book of Estimates was on the tables which the gentleman quotes from, and the amount of deficiency asked for was $5,221,264.10. Not one dollar of that five millions is in the Book of Estimates at all. Let me turn to another page. I read "Estimates for the building for the War, State, and Navy Departments." This was sent to the House by the Secretary of State, asking for $2,652,833; and not one dollar of that sum was in the Book of Estimates. And yet this estimate was sent to Congress January 14, 1873. Now, for the convenience of the House and for the information of its members, I submit, and will have printed in the RECORD, a complete list of the official estimates that were sent to the House after the Book of Estimates was delivered to us last year, and that list gives the date of each estimate sent in, the object, and the amount asked for. The list shows a total from the different Departments of $23,281,340.46 of additional estimates, not one dollar of which was in the Book of Estimates which the gentleman still asserts contains all the estimates of all the Departments. This amount, added to the amount recommended in the Book of Estimates, makes a total of more than $332,000,000, a sum many millions more than all the amounts appropriated under the laws making permanent appropriations, and by the annual bills. I again pronounce the gentleman's charge as wholly untrue.

I here insert the list:

Statement of additional estimates received by the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives during the third session of the Forty-second Congress, and subsequent to the rendition of the annual Book of Estimates.

[The date of the manuscript letter or the numbers of the executive documents submitting the estimate will be found in brackets.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to finish what I have to say upon another point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no knowledge of the A B C's, or of the multiplication table, or of any other patent and indubitable thing, if this list, in connection with the Book of Estimates, does not answer all that the gentleman has alleged on this subject. Add to your $308,000,000 in the Book of Estimates for last year the $23,000,000 of additional estimates subsequently sent in, and you get $331,000,000 of estimates that were sent in. How dare a man say that our appropriations exceeded all the estimates of all the Departments by $15,500,000, or by any other sum? How dare he deny the demonstrated fact that the appropriations, including the sinking fund, were less than the estimates by many millions?

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other question between the gentleman from Kentucky and myself, and that is the statement in his high-sounding proclamation of last week, when he said, "I will prove that the gentleman from Massachusetts did not make a mistake; was not in error when he said that he had included the sinking fund in his statement of expenditures of previous years, as well as in the appropriation for this current year." And the gentleman from Kentucky would say that with his Ithuriel spear he had touched all the false logic and had driven all his opponents to the wall, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts had retreated from his own positions for fear of his party. I am very sure the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] does not need or welcome any such defense. He is amply able to take care of himself. Should the time come when he needs assistance, I am sure he will ask to be delivered from such an ally.

Non tali auxilio,
Non istis defensoribus.

Not by such a right hand does he need any protection.

The whole question is in a nutshell. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated correctly from the books of the Treasury the expenditures for a series of years. Then in stating the appropriations for this year he included the $29,000,000 of sinking fund estimated for in the permanent appropriations, but had not put in the sinking fund in his statement of expenditures for preceding years. Of course it would have been unjust to compare the expenditures of 1873, omitting the sinking fund, with the appropriations for 1874 that did contain the sinking fund. So soon as the error was pointed out to him the gentleman from Massachusetts with his usual frank manliness acknowledged the error, and that was the end of it.

But the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] grieving that he had lost a much-desired opportunity for accusing Congress of outrageous extravagance, chides the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for correcting the mistake, and tries to defend the error itself. In attempting to do this he plainly confounds things wholly distinct from each other. He seems to think that what are called permanent appropriations relate wholly to the public debt and other extraordinary expenditures, and that what we call annual appropriations are only for ordinary purposes. And he thinks that when he shows that our annual appropriations, including claim bills and pension bills with the rest, have been increasing, he thereby proves that our expenditures are increasing. He does not notice the plain fact that many of the permanent appropriations are for ordinary expenditures. For example, the costs of collecting the customs, which amount annually to more than seven millions, are among the permanent appropriations.

It proves nothing to his advantage to say that some of our expenditures are annually increasing. Of course they are, for some of them ought to increase.

The fact is that there are two forces all the while at work in our expenditures. The one is the force that is increasing, by the natural and proper growth of the Government. Can any rational man fail to see that there ought to be an increase in those functions of the Government that relate to the growth and development of the country? For example, the Post-Office Department is extending and increasing, by the growth of communication and the extension of railroads. No man in his senses supposes that we can razee the service to the measure of former years, and make its operations less year by year. I glory in the growth of every one of our Departments that represent the actual wants of a great and growing country. Nobody believes that we can cut down the State Department year by year; that is impossible.

Where abuses have crept into any Department we should correct them. Where unnecessary expenditures are being made we can cut them off. It is our duty also to cut down all those expenditures that grew out of the war, that were necessary in their time, but year by year, as the war bills are settled, become unnecessary, these can be dispensed with. The war expenditures have been decreasing for the last seven years, and have decreased more rapidly than our ordinary expenses have increased; so that on the whole there has been a decrease.

Mr. BECK. Does the gentleman from Ohio mean to tell the House that the collections made by the Post-Office Department directly from the people appear at all in the Book of Estimates?

Mr. GARFIELD. "The gentleman from Ohio" did not say anything about the revenues of the Post-Office, and he will not be diverted from his statement concerning the growth of a portion of our expenditures.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Ohio said the increase of the Post-Office was from the increase of business.

Mr. GARFIELD. I said the business of the Post-Office Department was growing, and ought to grow as the country expands and fills up.

Mr. BECK. Its growth does not appear in the estimates.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course it does. All that we appropriate for it appears in the estimates.

Mr. BECK. The deficiencies?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; the deficiencies of expenditures beyond the receipts. I have been showing that one class of our expenditures are annually increasing while another class—those growing out of the war—are annually decreasing, and that the decrease has been greater than the increase.

Now I come back to the question of the sinking fund. The gentleman from Kentucky stands on record as making a pledge that he would prove that the sinking fund was included in the expenditures for recent years, as given by the gentleman from Massachusetts. My eloquent and witty friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] expressed the hope that the gentleman would for once keep some of the promises he had been making for the last five years. To-day he has tried to redeem his promise, that he would convict the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] of having "backed out," as he said, without just cause; that he would prove that the sinking fund was in the statement of expenditures for last year and the year before, and that the gentleman ought to have persisted in his first statement. I listened with the closest attention to his remarks on this point, and it must have been my dullness, for I could see nothing that approached a demonstration, nothing that gave even the faintest support to his proposition.

For lack of anything to answer, I will again give the proof that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was in error.

I hold in my hand the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is our official statement of expenditures for the year that ended the 30th of June last. On the fourth page I find the Secretary's statement of what the actual expenditures were; he gives it by items, and I quote it entire:

The net expenditures during the same period (the fiscal year 1873,) were—

For civil expenses	$19,348,521 01
For foreign intercourse	1,571,362 85
For Indians	7,951,704 88
For pensions	29,359,426 86
For military establishment, including fortifications, river and harbor improvements, and arsenals	46,323,138 31
For naval establishment, including vessels and machinery, and improvements at navy-yards	23,526,256 79
For miscellaneous, civil, including public buildings, light-houses, and collecting the revenue	52,408,226 20
For interest on the public debt	104,750,688 44
For premium on bonds purchased	5,105,919 99
Total, exclusive of the public debt	290,345,245 33

We thus have the official statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, which shows that the total expenditure of $290,345,245.33—the amount given by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES]—does not include one dollar of payment of the principal of the public debt; and everybody knows that the sinking fund is for the payment of the principal of the public debt.

Now, after the $290,000,000 were expended, there remained a surplus of $43,000,000. What was done with that? Twenty-nine million dollars of it were used for the sinking fund; the remainder was used in buying other bonds constituting the principal of the public debt. Now, in the spirit of comradeship and a desire to know just the truth, without any regard to partisan purposes, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and myself went to the Treasury Department shortly after he had made his speech, and we sat down with the accounting officer—the man who makes up all the statements of the public receipts and expenditures. We went over the figures carefully, and found that the statement made in the annual report was strictly true; and I now affirm that, so far as my knowledge goes, there is not one member of the House, save the gentleman from Kentucky, who now denies that the statement was correct—that the gentleman [Mr. DAWES] had included the sinking fund in his statement for this year, and omitted it in those for preceding years.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Ohio ought to know that I do not deny that statement; but I proved it; $290,000,000, with $29,000,000 for the sinking fund, make $319,000,000. Any man with the sense of a mouse knows that. I never denied it; it is what I said.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, is that all?

Mr. BECK. Do not $290,000,000 and $29,000,000 make $319,000,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, that is the only correct arithmetic I have heard from the gentleman.

Mr. BECK. I have not denied that; I have maintained it to be a fact. But the gentleman from Ohio denied that the $319,000,000 was the amount of appropriations by law. He said it embraced appropriations made by warrant, and he promised to make good his position against all comers; and the gentleman now rises to misrepresent me as having denied that $290,000,000 and $29,000,000 make $319,000,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad to draw the gentleman out; and in order to pin him down to the case, here it is. The gentleman from Massachusetts gave these figures: "Expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, $290,345,245.27; appropriations for 1874, $319,000,000; an increase of nearly $30,000,000 in our expenditures." Thereupon I rose to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts, and asked him if he had not included in his $319,000,000 the sinking fund. "Certainly I have," said he, "but it was also included in the $290,000,000, the expenditures of last year." That was the question at issue. I then gave him the proof that the $290,000,000 did not include the sinking fund. He saw it, and promptly acknowledged the mistake. So far as I know, everybody else saw it, except the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] Now to-day, on this floor, the gentleman from Kentucky says that the gentleman from Massachusetts was mistaken in acknowledging that the $290,000,000 did not include the sinking fund.

Mr. BECK. I did not say that.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what the gentleman has been saying in the hearing of the House at least three times.

Mr. BECK. I never have said any such thing.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then does the gentleman now say (and I yield to him that he may answer) that the $290,000,000 of expenditures for last year does not include the sinking fund?

Mr. BECK. This is what I say, in a word: that the $319,000,000 includes the sinking fund; deducting the sinking fund, it leaves $290,000,000 as the appropriations for this year, less the sinking fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. But I speak of last year.

Mr. BECK. For last year $299,000,000 were the total appropriations for the year; in that the sinking fund was included. If the Administration spent any more than that, it spent it in violation of positive law. That is what I said.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why does not the gentleman stick to the point? Did the $290,000,000 expended last year include the sinking fund?

Mr. BECK. The expenditures of last year, as I showed to-day—not, as the gentleman from Ohio had maintained, expenditures by warrant, but appropriations by law——

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman answer that question? Did the $290,000,000 of expenditures of last year include the sinking fund?

Mr. BECK. The $299,000,000 of appropriations does. Now, he can make it to suit himself, and $29,000,000 in $299,000,000. Is not that the fact? Let me ask the gentleman to answer.

Mr. GARFIELD. At last, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman acknowledges that the $299,000,000 expenditure of last year does not include the sinking fund.

Mr. BECK. I say it does.

Mr. GARFIELD. Thank you for that——

Mr. DAWES. It is not correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is good as far as it goes. It comes within $9,000,000 of being true. The expenditures were $290,000,000, not $299,000,000, and did not include the sinking fund.

Mr. BECK. The sinking fund is included in every year's estimate and appropriations; but the gentleman from Ohio evaded it all the time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course the sinking fund is estimated for, and is among the permanent appropriations; but the $290,000,000 of last year did not include the sinking fund, and the $319,000,000, the total appropriations for this year, did include the sinking fund. If you take the sinking fund from the $319,000,000, it leaves $290,000,000 as the total appropriations for the current year. Thus the appropriations for the current year are no greater than the expenditures of last year. The gentleman cannot blot out these figures nor impair their force.

And this fact sweeps away utterly the assumption that since last year we have increased the expenditures by the sum of twenty-nine or thirty millions.

Mr. DAWES. Let me say a word.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Two hundred and ninety million dollars last year were the expenses independent of the sinking fund. Now, the sinking fund is to be added to that and taken from the $43,000,000, as I stated to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly that is so.

Mr. DAWES. That was part of the appropriation of last year, just as much as any other appropriation. I stated $290,000,000 as the expenditures, and $43,000,000 public debt. That is the way I stated it. The $43,000,000 public debt I stated contained this $29,000,000. That was a part of the appropriation. If you put it along with the $290,000,000, it will trouble my friend on the right [Mr. GARFIELD] instead of my friend on the left, [Mr. BECK.]

I did not state it accurately at that time. My friend from Ohio correctly stated it to the House. He corrected me, because I should have stated it in this way: $290,000,000, and $29,000,000 of public debt which is contained in this $43,000,000. We only paid that year, over and above the sinking fund, the difference between $43,000,000 and $29,000,000, which is $14,000,000 of public debt independent of them. And when the Treasury Department made a report showing their expenditures were $290,000,000 and $43,000,000 they paid of public debt, they meant this—and the pity is they did not say so—that their ordinary expenses, independent of the sinking fund and public debt, were $290,000,000. The sinking fund appropriated for was $29,000,000 more, and they extinguished $14,000,000 of public debt in addition to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree to all the gentleman from Massachusetts has said; and it does not disturb any statement I have made. The $43,000,000, of which he speaks, was the surplus of our receipts over all expenditures except payment of the principal of the public debt. Of this surplus, $29,000,000 were used in paying the sinking fund, and the balance was used in buying other bonds; and was thus also applied to the reduction of the public debt.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had according to order had under consideration the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, late an officer in the United States Navy.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, Mr. WHEELER, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. TYNER, ask to be excused from service on the committee to attend the funeral obsequies of the late MILLARD FILLMORE, at Buffalo, New York. There being no objection the gentlemen will be excused from further service on that committee, and the Chair will appoint in their places Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, and Mr. MACDOUGALL, of New York. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] who was appointed this morning will be chairman of the committee, and will make the necessary arrangements.

SUSAN D. GALLOWAY.

On motion of Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway, with an amendment by the Senate, to change "L" in the name to "D," was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-three minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Bridget Collins, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of 23 workingmen at Lewistown, Mifflin County, Pennsylvania, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee; in opposition to any increase in internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on foreign imports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SWANN: The memorial of Mrs. Jane Dulaney, widow of the late Colonel William Dulaney, United States Marine Corps, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. TREMAIN: Several petitions of members of the bar of the county of Albany, New York, for the division of the northern district of New York, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WARD, of Illinois: The petition of Mrs. Mary P. Wilson, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of the Marietta monthly meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, in Iowa, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1874.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, offered the following PRAYER.

O Lord, our God, Thou hast made us and brought us into being, and not we ourselves. All our breath is in Thine hands. The light of the morning sun falls upon the busy scenes of men; but there are mysterious shadows in many dwellings. We miss some of our number, who are withdrawn from these seats and are lying prostrate with sickness and disease; and especially one who but yesterday came into this Chamber with all the presence of his manly form, but now, when we meet again this morning, lies close to the edge of the dark river. O, God, we beseech Thee, be very near to the soul of Thy servant at this time. If it were possible, we would pray Thee to restore him, but if Thou hast otherwise appointed, then we beseech Thee support him with the hope of Thy people, and with the glorious prospect of the coming resurrection and the blessed immortality. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in view of the fact, known to many of the Senators, that one of our members lies dangerously ill, and perhaps dying, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 11, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion—the motion which I entered to reconsider the vote by which the resolution allowing the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to take testimony and to employ a stenographer and clerk, in reference to the western judicial district of Arkansas, was adopted. An arrangement has been made between that committee and the Committee on the Judiciary by which we can use the testimony taken by the one committee in the other, and save the expense of taking it again. This is satisfactory to all parties, and I therefore withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. SENER. I believe, under the rules of the House, it is too late now for the gentleman to withdraw his motion to reconsider. He should move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw his motion. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire, also, to say that the remarks I made yesterday, when the House was in Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill, were sent to me for revision late last evening. The reporters, of course, were engaged on their work until late at night, and could not get through with it earlier. It was not their fault. It was impossible for me to revise my remarks in time to get them in this morning's RECORD. A portion of what was sent to me was colloquy with other gentlemen. It would be unjust to them to have my remarks in one issue of the RECORD and theirs in another. I therefore ask consent of the House that the whole of the remarks made in connection with my speech shall be printed with it in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. FOSTER. That is satisfactory.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think that should be done in justice to all.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. SYPHER. I ask unanimous consent to offer, for present consideration, a bill to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read. It proposes to appropriate, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War at the mouth of the Mississippi River; said sum to be available from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. SYPHER. I ask that I may be permitted, by unanimous consent, to make a brief statement in relation to this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SYPHER. I hope the gentleman will allow me one minute to make an explanation.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must object to the bill unless it goes to a committee. I have no objection to its being considered by a committee, with authority to report it back at any time.

Mr. SYPHER. I wish merely to say that the money appropriated for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River last year was $125,000, and that appropriation is entirely exhausted, owing to the additional amount of labor that was required there over what was done in previous years. There are now vessels fast on the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and within twelve hours probably there will be a dozen ships there trying to get in and out. And unless relief be afforded by Congress immediately, an amount of damage will be done to the commerce of that valley that will be irreparable. This is precisely similar to the bill which was passed on the 9th February for the relief of the harbor of Buffalo. The necessity for it, I think, need not be further stated, as it must be appreciated by every gentleman in the House. The Secretary of War has written a letter recommending this appropriation. He states that the money has been entirely exhausted, and that unless a further appropriation be made by Congress, no work can be done there until the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. STANARD. I hope that this bill will be considered this morning. As has been stated by the gentleman from Louisiana, the appropriation which was made——

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a question of order. I have not withdrawn my objection. I have said that I have no objection to the bill going to the Committee on Commerce, with authority to report at any time. But I must object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. This matter, in common with all other appropriations relating to harbors, is now under consideration by the Committee on Commerce; and in my judgment the committee ought to be consulted with reference to it.

Mr. SYPHER. Will the gentleman allow me to say——

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to suggest to the House that the time must not be wasted on matters where an absolute objection is made. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] makes absolute objection.

Mr. SYPHER. Then I will make a request, to which I presume there will be no objection, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report back at any time.

There was no objection; and the bill, (H. R. No. 2451,) having been read a first and second time, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report at any time.

CANAL BETWEEN THE MISSISSIPPI AND ILLINOIS RIVERS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of nearly 3,000 citizens of Illinois and Iowa, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the construction of a canal from Rock Island, on the Mississippi River, to Hennepin, on the Illinois River; and moved that the memorial be printed, with the first name, and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

HUBBARD'S MEMORIAL.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported adversely upon the following resolution; and the same was laid upon the table:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of Hubbard's memorial, concerning commerce by railroads among the several States, being House Miscellaneous Document No. 140, be printed for the use of the House.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported the following concurrent resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that grave abuses exist in the Government Printing Office; and whereas the abolition of the franking privilege will largely reduce the amount of public printing: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Joint Committee on Printing be required to report, by bill or otherwise, whether the Government Printing Office cannot be discontinued, and whether large sums of money cannot be annually saved by a change in the method of doing the public printing; and that said Joint Committee on Printing have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. DONNAN. I call the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that part of the preamble which asserts that the existence or non-existence of the franking privilege should regulate the printing ordered by the Government. It seems to me frivolous, and I hope the committee will change that part of it.

Mr. COBURN. I rose to make a suggestion of the same kind.

Mr. CONGER. I had hoped that Congress would determine the amount of printing to be done from its merits or deserts, and that the existence or non-existence of a personal privilege would not control the printing of this Government.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] yield for an amendment?

Mr. DONNAN. I do not.

Mr. CONGER. Then I hope the House will vote down the previous question.

The question was put on seconding the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 38, noes 10, no quorum voting.

Mr. CONGER. The chairman of the committee agrees with me in sentiment and yet he will not agree to the amendment.

Mr. DONNAN. What is the use of amending a preamble?

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. DONNAN were appointed.

The House divided, and 94 members voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CONGER. Feeling that, perhaps, a majority of the House are in favor of this improper proposition in the preamble, I will not ask a further count.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order of business.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the morning hour commences at twenty-seven minutes after twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty, reported yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and the question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill to strike out on page 2, line 16, the words "and shall not have remarried." I do not think that the marriage of one of these widows should deprive her of the pension provided for by existing law or by this bill.

The bill as reported from the committee provides that a widow in order to be entitled to the pension shall not have remarried. Now I hope gentlemen will allow me to offer an amendment to strike out the words "and shall not have remarried," so that those old ladies who were widows of soldiers, and who may have since remarried, shall be entitled to the benefits of the act. Surely their remarriage should not be regarded as a reason for imposing a penalty upon them and depriving them of the bounty of the Government. Will the gentleman admit that amendment?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I must decline to admit that amendment. The principle of this bill is the principle that prevails in regard to all other pensions.

Mr. SPEER. I know that; but the number of these persons is very few, and it is growing less from year to year. It would be a gracious, generous, and just act on the part of the Government to give them this recognition in their old age.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The bill is very liberal now.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to accept an amendment which I will indicate. It is in section 3, to make the phrase "loss of a certificate of discharge" read "lack of a certificate of discharge." I will tell the gentleman why I propose such an amendment. In my State there are at present, right about where I live, some three hundred persons, old men and old women, who are interested in this bill. The old men were soldiers in the service of the Government when Maine was invaded in the last war with England. They were called out and were in the military service; that is undisputed. Those facts have been established, and they have received bounty-land warrants. But in many cases, I think perhaps in a majority of cases, they did not receive a regular certificate of discharge, being a peculiar kind of military force, ready for marching orders. I am apprehensive that if the word "loss" is retained, the Department may insist that these persons are cut off from receiving a pension; that they must once have had a discharge and lost it. I hope the gentleman will not object to substituting the word "lack" for "loss," because it is in the spirit and intent of his bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I am willing to insert after "loss" the words "or lack."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That will answer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for an amendment which I will indicate. It is in the first section, in the fifteenth line, to strike out "1824" and insert "1840," so that it will read "such widows shall have been married prior to 1840." From 1840 to 1874 is an ordinary generation of life; and it seems to me that if these old and decrepit and infirm widows were married a generation or more ago this pension should not be denied them. I trust the gentleman will allow that amendment, so that in all cases where these parties were married more than a generation ago of the ordinary life of man, this allowance may still be granted to them.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I cannot yield for that amendment. We have liberalized the law as far as we feel justified in doing.

Mr. POLAND. I ask the gentleman to permit me to offer an amendment to the third section, to add to it the following proviso:

Provided, That when any person has been granted a land-warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the war of 1812, such allowance shall be prima facie evidence of his service and discharge, so as to entitle him if alive, or his widow if he be dead, to a pension; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land-warrant was improperly granted.

These soldiers certainly ought not to be compelled to prove their cases over again, when they have once so far established their services as to be entitled to land-warrants under the act of Congress.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is so considered now at the Pension Office, I understand.

Mr. POLAND. Then my amendment will do no harm.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Has the gentleman any doubt that under his bill such cases as the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] provides for will be construed by the Department as prima facie cases?

Mr. SPRAGUE. A great many of these warrants were obtained on improper or fraudulent testimony.

Mr. POLAND. My amendment provides that such testimony shall not be conclusive.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I know the amendment is guarded.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It only constitutes prima facie evidence. Certainly the amendment, which is precisely the same as a bill introduced by me in the beginning of the session, should be adopted, if it is necessary to cover such cases as I have before named. The safe thing is to adopt it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont may be adopted. I think it is just and proper.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I cannot admit the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. It should be adopted for this reason: that in nine cases out of ten the witnesses who testified before are now dead.

Mr. POLAND. Let us at least have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. SPEER. Would it not be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered?

Mr. POLAND. It has not been ordered yet.

Mr. SPEER. I thought it was ordered on yesterday.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A single suggestion in regard to the fifth section, which I think would work an unintentional injustice. It provides that these old pensioners, who, because of being in the Southern States, have been dropped from the rolls for a time, shall have their pensions from the time this act shall take effect. Why not allow them their pensions right along?

Mr. SPRAGUE. This bill contains the provision in all our pension laws. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded; there being upon a division—ayes 40, noes not counted.

Mr. POLAND. I now move to amend section 3, by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That when any person has been granted a land-warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the war of 1812, such allowance shall be prima facie evidence of his service and discharge, so as to entitle him if alive, or his widow if he be dead, to a pension; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land-warrant was improperly granted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that, inasmuch as the language used all through this bill is "honorable discharge," he should use the same words in his amendment.

Mr. POLAND. The object of my amendment is to provide that where these old soldiers have applied under any law of Congress for a land-warrant and it has been allowed to them, that allowance shall be prima facie evidence of their right to a pension.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly the proposition is manifestly right. Our experience in reference to legislation of this class shows the propriety of the amendment. But the language used in the bill refers to "soldiers honorably discharged." I suggest to the gentleman to adopt the same language in his amendment.

CONDITION OF SENATOR SUMNER.

The SPEAKER. As so much anxiety is felt with regard to the condition of the eminent Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. SUMNER, the Chair will direct the reading of whatever bulletins he may receive on that subject. A message just received will now be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

12.40 p. m.—Mr. SUMNER appears to be sinking slowly; but there is no decided change.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. POLAND. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and modify my amendment by inserting the word "honorable" before "discharge."

The amendment of Mr. POLAND, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. SPEER. I move to amend by striking out, at the end of the first section, the words "and shall not have remarried." I will state the object of this amendment. The persons who will be claimants under a law of this kind are growing fewer every year; and the Congress of the nation should not, in my judgment, visit upon them a penalty on account of their remarriage. The fact of their remarriage may not help their condition in any way. They may be as dependent now as though they had never remarried. The husband may have died the next year, or month, or week, or day after the remarriage. Yet it is proposed to debar these women from the benefits of this bill on account of their remarriage. The husband, if living, may be infirm and helpless; so that, instead of rendering any assistance toward the support of the wife, he may be absolutely a burden upon her. There is no reason why the Government, in extending its bounty to this meritorious class of persons, should limit it to those who shall have remained widows from the death of their husbands who were in the service. I trust the House will adopt my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. SPEER was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out the following proviso at the end of the fifth section:

Provided, That the restoration and pension contemplated herein shall take effect from the passage of this act.

The section to which this amendment is appended proposes to remove from the pensioners the disability imposed by the act of 1864. Now it seems to me manifestly unjust that by this proviso we should confiscate the pension during the intervening time. While the war was going on, while the Union was still unrestored, it was a very proper thing to cut off the pensions of those who were disloyal. But I cannot see why the pensions of these men should be confiscated by the Government while no other property is confiscated. Therefore I desire a vote upon the question of striking out these words.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The amendment would restore pensions which have been lost by reason of disloyalty during the rebellion; and we do not propose, in this bill, to put the disloyal upon an equality with those who have been faithful to the country. That is the objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To that I make this answer: Those who had not served for sixty days or for any specified time are now put upon the pension-rolls. These men had, according to the judgment of Congress, rendered such service as to entitle them to a pension; it was their right which had been granted to them. The pension was their property, inalienable except on account of their disloyalty while that disloyalty existed, and while the safety of the country required such a policy. But the time of danger has now passed; and I do not see why these old men should be deprived of their pensions while all other persons in the South are left to enjoy their property. If anybody wants to introduce a general confiscation act with reference to property in the South, I do not know whether I shall vote for it or not; but I certainly am not going to vote for confiscation unless it is general.

The amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, was agreed to.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to amend by striking out in the proviso of the first section "1825," and inserting "1840;" so that the proviso will read as follows:

Provided, That such widows shall have been married prior to the year 1840 to an officer or enlisted or drafted man who served as aforesaid in said war, and shall not have remarried.

Mr. TODD. I hope my colleague [Mr. CESSNA] will modify his amendment by striking out "40" and inserting "50."

Mr. CESSNA. My judgment is that the amendment goes as far as the temper of the House will sustain me. I have no objection to allowing my colleague [Mr. TODD] to move an amendment to my amendment, striking out "40" and inserting "50;" so that the House may choose between the two propositions. I prefer to adhere to my amendment in the form in which I have offered it, because between 1840 and the present time an ordinary generation has passed away.

Mr. TODD. I move to amend the amendment of my colleague by inserting "50" instead of "40." There is no reason or justice in excluding from the benefits of this act a woman who married an old soldier in 1850, while one who married such a soldier in 1840 receives the advantage of the law. If any allowance is to be made for marriages subsequent to the war, it should embrace all who married soldiers at any time prior to their death. If there are equities in favor of any of those women, the equities are more strongly in favor of those who married soldiers in their old age, who took care of them and nursed them to the time of their death, than those who married soldiers in the vigor of manhood. And I trust the House will adopt this amendment, to cover all imaginable cases.

The question recurred on Mr. TODD'S amendment to the amendment; and there were—ayes 73, noes 62.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CESSNA'S amendment to the amendment was then adopted.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to amend section 6 as follows: Strike out all after the word "shall," in line 9, page 5, to the word "be," in line 12, same page. The words I propose to strike out are as follows:

On proof satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior that said pensioner did not take up arms against the Government or in any manner encourage the rebels.

I understand it to be the object of this bill not to visit upon the pensioners or their widows anything which occurred during the late war. We have omitted it, as far as the pensioner himself is concerned, and I ask in all liberality that we shall not visit it upon his widow. In order to carry out that idea I move the amendment I have indicated.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 52; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. SPRAGUE and Mr. HEREFORD.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 54.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I move to strike out in lines 16, 17, and 18, on page 5, these words:

And in case there are no minor children, then the arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the heirs or legal representatives of such pensioner.

They are the last three lines of the bill. It provides arrearages shall be paid to heirs who are over age. The object of this bill, as I understand it, as of all pension bills, is to protect the feeble and helpless, those who are crippled, who are unable to make a living for themselves. This provides, however, that arrearages of pensions shall not only go to minor children, but to legal representatives and to heirs over age. I move that provision be stricken out.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does any pension law provide for collateral heirs?

Mr. COBURN. I believe not. This pension bill goes much further than any law we have ever had. I move to strike out the provision giving arrearages of pension to persons over age and to legal representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRAGUE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS TO TOTALLY DISABLED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. RUSK. I am instructed to report back from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill (H. R. No. 735) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. The first section provides that section 4 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," and approved March 3, 1873, be so amended that all persons who, while in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty, shall have lost the sight of both eyes, or shall have lost the sight of one eye, the sight of the other having been previously lost, or shall have lost both hands, or shall have lost both feet, or been permanently and totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so permanently and totally disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to a pension of fifty dollars per month; and this shall be in lieu of a pension of $31.25 per month granted to such persons by said section. The second section provides that the act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. SPEER. I think section 2 should be stricken out; it is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. RUSK. There is a report accompanying the bill, which fully explains its object, and, if necessary, it can be read.

Mr. SPEER. The second section provides that this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage. I move that be stricken out, as the bill will have that effect without any such section.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. If there be no objection, I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. WOODFORD. I suggest, in order to make this bill complete, in line 6, after the word "who," these words should be interlined, "by reason of injuries received or disease contracted;" and in line 7, after the words "United States," should be interlined, "or in the Marine Corps;" so it will read:

That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," and approved March 3, 1873, be so amended that all persons who, by reason of injuries received or disease contracted while in the military or naval service of the United States, or in the Marine Corps, and in the line of duty, shall have lost the sight of both eyes, or shall have lost the sight of one eye, the sight of the other having been previously lost, or shall have lost both hands, or shall have lost both feet, or been permanently and totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so permanently and totally disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to a pension of fifty dollars per month; and this shall be in lieu of a pension of $31.25 per month granted to such persons by said section.

Mr. RUSK. I do not yield for any amendment, as the bill has been carefully drawn. It is worded precisely in accordance with existing law, only providing for the increase of pensions from $31.25 to fifty dollars per month. It covers the Marine Corps cases. It covers all the cases. The bill does not change the law, but merely increases this class of pensions.

If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] permits the reading of the report, I am satisfied he will be content to allow the bill to pass. It covers precisely what the gentleman desires.

Mr. WOODFORD. Very well. Then I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer the following additional amendment, to come in at the close of the first section of the bill:

And all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or shall have been totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for the performance of any manual labor, but not so much so as to require regular personal aid and attendance, shall be entitled to a pension of thirty-five dollars per month; and all those persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or shall have been totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to render their incapacity to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty-five dollars per month.

Mr. RUSK. I decline to admit the amendment, and call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 73, noes not counted—and the main question was ordered.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 1387, a bill (H. R. No. 2452) to equalize pensions in certain cases.

The bill was read. It provides that all persons entitled to pensions under special acts fixing the rate of such pensions, and now receiving or entitled to receive a less pension than that allowed by the general pension-laws under like circumstances, are, in lieu of their present rate of pension, hereby declared to be entitled to the benefits and subject to the limitations of the general pension laws, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873, and that the act shall go into effect from and after its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] will consent to add the words "provided that this act shall not reduce any pension." As the bill stands, it may be construed to reduce pensions.

Mr. RUSK. The bill is drawn in accordance with the suggestions of the Commissioner of Pensions. It provides for the cases of all now receiving or entitled to receive a less pension than that allowed by the general pension laws. It does not interfere with those drawing higher pensions.

Mr. HOLMAN. We passed such an act as this a few years ago, and it was found that it reduced quite a number of pensions; and the House from time to time had to increase those pensions.

Mr. RUSK. I will say, for the information of the gentleman, that the act we passed a few years ago stated that all cases of pensions under special acts should be rated under the general law. It was not drawn as this is drawn. This says that all pensioners drawing a less pension than they would be entitled to under the general law shall receive what the general law would entitle them to. It does not disturb those drawing higher pensions.

Mr. HOLMAN. It makes them all subject to the provisions of the general pension law. If the gentleman will allow me, I will offer the following amendment:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided, however, that this act shall not be construed to reduce any pension granted by special act.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to that being added.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO ONE-ARMED SOLDIERS.

Mr. RUSK. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report a bill (H. R. No. 2453) to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873, as a substitute for sundry bills referred to the committee.

The bill was received, and read a first and second time.

The bill proposes to amend the fourth section of the act entitled "An act to reduce, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873, by adding thereto the following:

Provided further, That all persons who under like circumstances have lost an arm at or above the elbow shall be rated in the second class, and shall receive twenty-four dollars per month.

Mr. RUSK. I will state that this makes the one-armed equal to the one-legged soldiers.

Mr. SPEER. That is right.

Mr. RUSK. I think there will be no objection to the bill, and I call the previous question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RUSK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to ask whether the Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered fully this question of the disability that is imposed by the loss of an arm. My attention has been particularly directed to that subject, and I am inclined to think that great injustice has been done to those suffering from that disability. From the reports made to me I am impressed with this view of the case, that the loss of a right arm, where a person is right-handed, or of a left arm, where the person is left-handed, is one of the greatest disabilities, in some respects greater than the loss of a leg or the loss of an eye, so far as ability to attend to the ordinary avocations of life is concerned. It does appear to me that the loss of an arm, especially of the arm which ordinarily is most used, is one of the greatest disabilities that can be suffered, and that it ought to be so considered by the pension laws.

If I understand this bill correctly from the reading of it, it puts those who have lost an arm in the second class of disabilities, and does not allow so high a rate of pension as in some other classes of disabilities. I am inclined to think that that is not right.

Mr. RUSK. It makes those who have lost an arm equal to those who have lost a leg above the knee; that is, it puts them in the second class, for which the pension is twenty-four dollars a month.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understood that the bill was to increase the pensions in that class of disabilities. But why should they not be made equal to any other, except the loss of both eyes or both legs, which might be worse; but that would constitute total disability?

Mr. SPEER. Cases of total disability constitute the first class, for which thirty dollars a month are allowed. This is the next class, and the bill puts the loss of an arm in this class, making the pension twenty-four dollars.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am informed by those around me who are more familiar with the subject than I am, that this bill improves the present law.

Mr. SPEER. The bill is directly in the line of the gentleman's views.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. I move that the reports accompanying these several bills be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RUSK, the Committee on Invalid Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the following memorials and bills reported back in connection with the bill just passed; and the same were laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The memorial of T. M. Mausen;

A petition from one-armed soldiers of the war of the rebellion, praying for an increased rate of pension;

A memorial in favor of an amendment to the pension laws, so that an invalid who has lost an arm above the elbow shall receive the same pension as those who have lost a leg above the knee;

The petition of Patrick Doyle and others, of Maine, for increase of pension in cases of loss of arm or hand;

A bill (H. R. No. 1138) to amend section 4 of an act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions;

A bill (H. R. No. 1066) to equalize pensions in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. No. 1239) to authorize the same rate of pension to be paid to soldiers who have lost an arm above the elbow as is now allowed to those who have lost a leg above the knee; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1006) relative to pensions of one-armed soldiers.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2454) to amend section 13 of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that section 13 of the act approved March 13, 1873, to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions, shall be so amended that whenever any widow or minor children entitled to a pension under the provisions of said act have died or shall die, or such widow has remarried or shall remarry, the dependent mother, father, or other relative of the soldier in the Army or Navy on whose account such widow or minor children were so entitled, shall be entitled to receive from the date of the death of the last of such children or the death or remarriage of such widow, there being no such minor children, the same pension as such relative would have received had there been no widow or minor children.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION TO SOLDIERS WHO HAVE LOST AN EYE.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2455) granting an allowance to soldiers who have lost an eye; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that any soldier who in the United States service in the line of his duty lost an eye, shall be entitled to receive, for the purpose of replacing the same by an artificial eye, the sum of thirty dollars, which shall be paid under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2456) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the third and last proviso of section 4 of the act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions be so amended that it will read as follows:

Provided further, That, except in cases of permanent specific disabilities, the increase of pension shall commence from the date of the examining surgeon's certificate that first shows the increased disability, and further increased in proportion to the increased disability described by subsequent certificates from the respective dates of said surgeon's certificates.

Mr. SPEER. I do not understand the effect of that bill, and I hope the gentleman from Missouri will explain it to the House.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will illustrate its effect by giving an instance, and it is an instance of a soldier from the gentleman's own State. There is now before the Committee on Invalid Pensions the case of a soldier of the Fifty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, who was wounded, and received a surgeon's certificate, which, I think, probably entitled him to four or eight dollars per month. The second year he was ordered before the surgeon to be re-examined, and the surgeon gave him a certificate of increased disability. The case came back before the Commissioner, and the pension was increased from that date. The third year he was ordered again before a surgeon for an examination, and the third surgeon gave him a certificate of still increased disability. The case came back to the Commissioner, and he decided that the increase of the pension should be from the last examination. Now, the committee hold that that is wrong, and the increase should be from the first examination.

Mr. SPEER. I am glad to hear the explanation; the bill is certainly right, and I earnestly hope it will pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

WIDOW OF H. F. GRIFFIN.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back to the House the bill (H. R. No. 953) for the relief of the widow of H. F. Griffin, late United States deputy marshal for the western district of Texas, at Tyler. The committee think that we have no business with the bill. There is a report accompanying it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks from the title that the bill belongs to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No; to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RUSK. There is no doubt that it belongs to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. All claims connected with the Post-Office Department should go to the Committee on Claims.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the bill and report were referred to the Committee on Claims, and the report was ordered to be printed.

DATE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 674) to provide that all pensions on account of death, wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States since March 4, 1861, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, on application filed previous to January 1, 1875, shall commence from the date of death or discharge, and for the payment of the arrears of pensions.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point of order that this bill, providing as it does for the payment of arrears of pension, should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I also move that all general debate on that motion be limited to one hour.

Mr. McCRARY. I do not wish to antagonize the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] at this time. But I am exceedingly anxious to progress with the consideration of the special order under my charge as rapidly as possible, as there are several gentlemen who desire to be heard upon that bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that there be a session on Friday evening for the consideration of the special order, and that the regular session of Saturday next also be set apart for the same purpose, the two sessions to be for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Unless some understanding can be come to when the House will proceed with the consideration of the Georgia contested-election case I must object. An arrangement is being made, though not yet fully consummated, under which the consideration of that case will consume probably not more than three or four hours. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] will indicate some early day, when they will not interpose the special order in the way of the election case, I will not object.

Mr. McCRARY. I hope to be out of the way of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] and everybody else, by the middle of next week.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to suggest that unanimous consent be given to take up the Georgia election case on Monday next, after the morning hour. That will be the best way to spend Monday.

The SPEAKER. There is already a special order, on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal. And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] has also given notice that he desires to have taken up, after that order shall have been disposed of, the bill in regard to the importation of contagious and infectious diseases.

BOISE BASIN BED-ROCK FLUMING COMPANY.

Mr. ORR, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 2457) granting the right of way to the Boise Basin Bed-Rock Fluming Company, of Idaho Territory, for the construction of ditches and flumes over the public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TIDE-FLATS, BUDD'S INLET, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. ORR also, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 2458) relinquishing the tide-flats at the southern extremity of Budd's Inlet, in Washington Territory, to the town of Olympia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAILROADS.

Mr. ORR also, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 2459) granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CASES OF EPIDEMIC CHOLERA.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Commerce the amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 29, authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera. The Committee on Commerce are unanimous in reporting in favor of concurring in the amendments of the Senate, with an amendment.

The Senate proposes to amend the preamble and joint resolution, so that it shall read as follows:

Whereas epidemic cholera prevailed during the year 1873 in various parts of the United States, especially in the valley of the Mississippi, causing deplorable mortality; and whereas it is highly important that, whenever such epidemics occur, the facts concerning the spread of the disease and its mode of propagation should be ascertained as fully as possible, with a view to the prevention or limitation of future outbreaks: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to detail one medical officer of the Army, who shall, during the present year, under the direction of the Surgeon-General of the Army, in connection with the supervising surgeon of the marine hospitals, acting under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, visit the towns at which cholera prevailed during 1873, or such of them as, in the opinion of the Surgeon-General and Secretary of the Treasury, may be necessary, confer with the health authorities and resident physicians of such towns, and collect, so far as possible, all facts of importance with regard to such epidemic, and shall make a detailed report of the information collected, on or before the 1st day of January, 1875, to the President, to be submitted to Congress.

No objection being made, the report was received.

The amendment reported by the committee was to add to the joint resolution, as amended, the following:

And the Surgeon-General is hereby authorized and directed to report to the Secretary of War, for publication, such information on the subject as he may have or shall obtain.

The amendment reported from the committee was agreed to, and the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was concurred in.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to detail a medical officer of the Army," &c.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the Georgia contested-election case may be taken up on Monday next, after the special order in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal shall have been disposed of.

Mr. BROMBERG. I must object, unless it is also put after the bill in relation to the importation of contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Then I must move to postpone the special order, for the purpose of taking up the Georgia contested-election case at once.

The SPEAKER. The House by a majority can determine whether it will proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole. Should the House refuse to go into Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] would be entitled to the floor upon the transportation bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] can then move to postpone the further consideration of that bill, which motion the House can determine by a majority vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I modify my motion to close debate, so that all general debate upon the bill shall be closed in one hour and a quarter after its consideration shall be resumed.

The motion to close debate was agreed to.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill was also agreed to, upon a division—ayes 76, noes not counted.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. McCRARY. I renew my request that a session of this House for debate only be held on Friday evening next, and that that session, together with the regular session of Saturday, shall be set apart for debate only on the bill in regard to commerce between the States by railroads, no business whatever to be transacted.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McCRARY. I now move to reconsider the order just made; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNEXPENDED BALANCES OF APPROPRIATION.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the resolution, introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] as to the amount of balances of certain appropriations, &c., have directed me to report back the resolution with a recommendation that it be adopted with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House what portion of the balances of appropriation remaining in the Treasury July 1, 1873, made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, limited by law to the payment of indebtedness incurred during the year for which they were made, has been drawn during the current fiscal year by any of the Departments of the Government, or any of the Bureaus thereof, stating specifically from what items of said balances of appropriation the amounts have been drawn, and the purposes to which the money so drawn has been applied, so far as the records in his Department exhibit said purposes.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the resolution these words:

And if any balances of such appropriations have been so drawn, that the Secretary of the Treasury report under what construction of law the same have been drawn, with a copy of the opinion of any officer of the Government as authority for such construction.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

GEORGIA ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the Georgia election case be set down for Tuesday next after the morning hour.

Objection was made.

SUPPORT OF THE ARMY IN 1870–'71.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the act of July 15, 1870, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Gause vs. Hodges, from the first district of Arkansas; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

BARRACKS AT ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the proposals made by citizens of Atlanta, Georgia, to sell ground for barracks, &c., at that place, as contemplated by House bill No. 1429; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the act of August 26, 1842, a statement showing the names of the clerks and other persons that have been employed in his Department during the year ending December 31, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service Reform.

SELLING LIQUOR TO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an amendment to existing laws fixing a minimum penalty for their violation in selling liquor to Indians; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN WATTS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the claim of John Watts for depredations committed by the Comanche Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA DRAW OF LONG BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the narrowing of the Virginia draw in the Long Bridge over the Potomac River by certain obstructions placed there by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES W. LONG.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 1701) for the relief of James W. Long, late a captain in the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FORT WILKINS, MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the relinquishment of Fort Wilkins, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FORT BUTLER MILITARY RESERVATION, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to House joint resolution No. 55, authorizing the Secretary of War to withdraw and discharge all title and claim to the unoccupied military reservation known as Fort Butler, situated on the Canadian River, in New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Attorney-General, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 2d instant, in relation to judicial affairs in the Territory of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July, 1854, three reports of the surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico on private lands in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

LIST OF CLERKS IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with act of Congress of August 26, 1842, reports showing the names of the clerks and others employed in the various Bureaus in his Department during the year 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

An act (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan D. Galloway.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is limited by order of the House to one hour and a quarter.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday, in his remarks, made a statement from which, if it is not corrected or rather explained, there may be a misconception of the real facts by the House and the country. For the purpose of correcting that statement I shall detain the committee for a few moments at this time.

He stated there was appropriated for the expenses of the Indian Department for the present fiscal year by the bill of the last Congress $8,000,000. That is capable of an explanation, which clearly shows a large part of that appropriation was not for expenses of the Indian service proper. It is true that by the regular appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress, and by the deficiency bill passed at the same session, there were appropriated $8,121,825.90. A very considerable portion of that appropriation was not for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Indian Department, or for maintaining and feeding the Indians, or fulfilling treaties with them, but was simply a pro forma appropriation.

For example, sir, there was appropriated in the regular deficiency bill of the last session of the last Congress $1,650,600, which was really the money of an Indian tribe formerly residing in Kansas. By a previous treaty with these Indians, known as the Osages, they agreed to sell their lands, and on the fund arising from that sale, while undis-posed of in the hands of the Government, the Government was to pay interest. When these Indians should desire to remove to the reservation designated for them in the Indian Territory, it was agreed this fund, or so much of it as should be necessary, should be transferred to the tribe in that Territory from whom the purchase of such reservation was made. Accordingly, in the deficiency appropriation bill of the last session of the last Congress $1,650,600, arising from the sale of their lands, was transferred to the Cherokees, as the value of land sold by the Cherokees for the benefit of the Osages. Not one dollar of it was the money of the Government, not one dollar of it came out of the Treasury of the United States, but was the proceeds of the sale of the lands belonging to the Osages themselves.

Then, again, before a transfer of credit from the Osages to the credit of the Cherokees was made, the proceeds of the sale remained in the hands of the Government, and under the terms of the treaty the Government was bound to pay interest on it. The amount of that interest was $105,720.

Therefore here are two items explained, which ran the appropriation bill up last year to $8,000,000, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday.

Here, again, is another considerable item. By a previous treaty made with two tribes consolidated in Wisconsin, known as the Stockbridges and Munsees, all their lands were to be sold and the proceeds held by the Government until distributed pro rata among the members of the tribes as fast as they should become citizens of the United States. By some mistake this fund was carried to the fund arising from the sale of public lands, and all that was done by the Indian appropriation bill and the regular deficiency bill at the last session of Congress, as to the proceeds of the sales of these lands, was simply to transfer $174,548 from the fund arising from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the fund arising under the treaty made by the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians. This, like the fund arising from the sale of the Osage lands, was a fund which did not come out of the Treasury of the United States. It did not affect that Treasury to the amount of one farthing. It was a fund arising from the sale of lands belonging to these Indians themselves. In other words, it was simply a transfer of this amount of money belonging to these Indians.

Now, these three items aggregate $1,930,868. That leaves appropriated by the deficiency and regular appropriation bills for Indian service proper $6,190,007.90. Now, it cannot be truthfully said that all this amount belongs to the current fiscal year, because there were appropriated to make up deficiencies accruing during the last fiscal year $648,489. This, subtracted from the $6,190,007.90, leaves $5,441,518 as the amount that was appropriated for the present fiscal year, and which properly belongs to the current expenses of the Indian Department, and to fulfill treaties with them.

Therefore the gentleman, inadvertently of course, was wide of the mark when he made the declaration that we had appropriated for the present fiscal year $8,000,000 for the Indian service. I thought it proper, on account of this statement having been made, that it should be accompanied with this correction, that the members of the House and the country might understand what the exact amount was that was appropriated for this service.

I now yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have given considerable time and taken much pains to analyze the various provisions of this bill, and the amounts of appropriation made under it; and I think I shall be enabled to call the attention of the committee to some important features of the bill which I trust the committee, or, if not the committee, the House, will correct by amendment. I have also adopted on this occasion a course which is unusual for me, of speaking from full notes, for the reason that figures are, to a very considerable extent, interspersed with what I shall have to say, and I desire to speak with entire accuracy.

The first feature of this bill to which I will ask the attention of the committee is in regard to the officers and clerks authorized by law, as stated in the report of the Committee on Appropriations, (House Report No. 139,) made at the time of the reporting of and which has relation to this bill, (H. R. No. 2064,) as compared with the number of officers and of clerks provided for in the appropriation act of March 3, 1873, covering the present fiscal year, and as compared with the recommendations contained in the bill under consideration, embracing the necessary appropriation to cover the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1875:

Two facts should, however, be considered in reference to this Department in this connection: first, that the great bulk of those clerks authorized by law was added during the height of the war, when we had enormous armies in the field; and, secondly, there are large numbers of enlisted men assigned to clerical duty in the War Department, not, I believe, enumerated in the above statement, as many, I am led to believe, as one hundred and eighty soldiers. The reduction, even as shown, is not equal, in my opinion, to what it should have been under a peace establishment.

The Post-Office Department I have tried to work out, but it seems almost past finding out; and I will give it more careful examination when the appropriations for the Post-Office Department are before the House.

The Department of Justice has but recently been organized; hence I cannot make these comparisons with fairness or clearness at this time.

It will be seen that in the Treasury Department and the Interior Department alone, under the act of March 3, 1873, there were appropriations made for the salaries of 1,178 persons more than the chairman [Mr. GARFIELD] can now find laws authorizing, not considering, and aside from, the 1,865 persons employed in the Treasury Department heretofore paid out of the appropriations for expenses of loans and notes. And by the proposed bill there are 777 persons in these two Departments who will hold positions without authority of law.

I propose now to look at some other features of this curious bill.

I find in various places new Bureaus established—unknown heretofore to the law—seven, I believe, in the Treasury Department, and in like manner new officers created. Also, six new Bureaus in the State Department.

Again, the chief clerks in some Departments receive as high as $3,500, while others holding equally responsible places, both as to trust and capacity, receive only $2,000. These I will make an effort to equalize when the bill is under discussion in the Committee of the Whole, by cutting down the higher ones to $2,500 and raising the lower ones to the same sum; for I favor adequate salaries, but desire to make them just to all.

Permit me now to direct the attention of the committee to the paragraphs in this bill on pages 20 and 21, making appropriations to the Internal-Revenue Department, and enter into comparisons in relation to the same, as compared with the past.

As to the paragraph embraced in lines 472 to 481 inclusive, I propose at the proper time to offer an amendment which will reduce the sum about $60,000, conforming in the main to the organization of this Bureau or Department as it stood in December, 1866, as shown in Executive Document No. 99. The expense then was, I believe, as follows:

1 Commissioner	$3,500
1 deputy commissioner	2,500
3 heads of divisions, $2,000 each	6,000
23 clerks class 4, at $1,800	41,400
39 clerks class 3, at $1,600	62,400
42 clerks class 2, at $1,400	58,800
15 clerks class 1, at $1,200	18,000
50 copyists, at $900	45,000
3 messengers, at $840	2,520
2 assistants, at $720	1,440
10 laborers, at $720	7,200
In all	248,760
Amount asked for the next fiscal year	308,380

Which would be a reduction from what is now asked in the present bill of $59,620.

At this point we may examine the reasons given by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a recent communication transmitted to this House, with a statement of the number of persons employed in December, 1866, and December, 1873, wherein he gives the reasons for the increase of clerical force in the Internal-Revenue Bureau proper, at this time, over the number employed in December, 1866. I think I can show that the Commissioner has not made a fair statement.

By the reports of the Commissioner the amount of internal revenue collected in 1866 was about $311,000,000, and in 1867 about $266,000,000, an average of about $288,500,000 per year; the taxes then reached every trade, occupation, business, produce, and person; nearly the entire amount was collected by assessments, and required an army of office-holders to administer the law. For the year ending June 30, 1873, the amount collected of internal revenue was about $114,000,000, about $110,000,000 of which were collected by stamps and from five general sources only. The estimate for the current year is $100,000,000.

By the comparative statement in the Commissioner's letter, (House Executive Document No. 99,) the whole number of persons employed in the Commissioner's office proper, on December 1, 1866, was 193—the act of July 13, 1866, authorized the employment of 256 persons—or 63 less than was authorized. On December 1, 1873, the number employed is 293. This is an increase of 100 over December 1, 1866, and 38 over the number authorized by the law of 1866.

I maintain that the collection of over $300,000,000, from the many sources heretofore named, would require more correspondence, a larger number of accounts, and the preparation and issue of more numerous forms, instructions, &c., than the collection of about one-third the amount from the five general sources only. This seems too apparent to admit of controversy. A relative decrease of inside force should, it seems to me, correspond to the decrease of outside force, when we consider the reduction of the amount collected on an average in 1866 and 1867, $288,500,000; and the estimates of the current fiscal year, $100,000,000—being a falling off of $188,500,000.

Let me give another illustration. There were collected in 1866 $236,000,000 of internal-revenue taxes from sources not taxable in 1873, a greater contrast than the one I have just stated as to what should be the expenses of the Commissioner's office proper.

To correspond with this repeal of taxes there has been a reduction of the following officers from time to time: collectors, 16; deputy collectors, 968; assessors, 241; assistant assessors, 3,318; tobacco inspectors, 729; revenue inspectors and detectives, (now agents,) 153; inspectors of coal oil, 105; special agents, 10; making a total reduction of officers, 5,541.

Let us look at this alleged increase of office duties in the adjustment of accounts. There has been, as stated, a reduction of 16 collectors and 241 assessors, whose accounts were settled quarterly, disposed of; while in 1866 there was a total of 3,518 monthly accounts—3,318 assistant assessors, 178 inspectors and detectives, and 22 special and revenue agents, against 1,324 of store-keepers and gaugers, 25 detectives, and 10 supervisors; total 1,359. In fact there were 2,159 more monthly accounts to be adjusted in 1866 than there were in 1873.

I think these comparisons make it clearly apparent that the Commissioner's office proper should be run on a less number of officers and clerks in 1873, and now at less expense than it was run in 1866.

Let us examine what these expenses were in 1866 and 1867, and compare them with the expenses of 1873:

For the year ending June 30, 1866:
Salaries of the officers and clerks	$277,672 71
Contingent expenses	40,093 02
Total	317,765 73
For the year ending June 30, 1867:
Salaries of the officers and clerks	$308,997 53
Contingent expenses	37,606 66
Total	346,604 19
For the year ending June 30, 1873:
Salaries of officers and clerks	$359,588 72
Contingent expenses	187,360 66
Total	546,949 38

The bare salaries last year were greater than the whole expenses were for either the year 1866 or the year 1867.

The contingent expenses of the offices for the year 1873 have increased over 1866, $147,267.02. The contingent expenses for the year 1873 exceed the like expenses for both years of 1866 and 1867 combined, to the amount of $109,606.98. This is startling, and needs explanation, for it has recently been shown that much money is annually wasted, misused, I may add plundered, from the contingent funds of the various Departments.

Another fact I may well here mention, although I have heretofore called attention partially to the facts. There were, in 1866, collected $311,000,000, of which only about $20,000,000 were by stamps; while in 1873, of the $114,000,000 collected, $110,000,000 were by stamps.

The next paragraph is embraced in lines 482 and 483, page 21, which provides for an appropriation for dies, paper, and stamps, $400,000, the same as for the year 1873; and yet it appears by the Fifth Auditor's report, page 40, that the Internal-Revenue Department expended for the above purposes $644,238.15 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873. This discrepancy needs explanation.

The next paragraph is embraced in lines 484 to 486 inclusive, on page 21, "for salaries and expenses of collectors, &c., $1,990,542;" while the Fifth Auditor's report, page 39, shows that the expenses for like purposes for the year ending June 30, 1873, were $1,585,476.28. Why this proposed increase for the coming fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, of $405,065.72?

The next paragraph is embraced in lines 487 to 491 inclusive, on page 21, "for salaries, expenses, and fees of supervisors, store-keepers, agents, surveyors, gaugers, and miscellaneous expenses, $2,600,000." The Fifth Auditor's report makes the following exhibit for the year ending June 30, 1873:

Supervisors' salaries, (page 42)	$33,351 65
Expenses	57,490 11
		$90,841 76
Agents' and detectives' salaries, (page 43)	48,884 00
Expenses	30,091 94
		78,975 94
Surveyors' salaries, (page 43)	23,589 26
Expenses	17,318 00
		30,907 26
Other expenses of surveyors, (page 28)		4,376 36
Store-keepers, (page 28)		564,856 18
Gaugers, (page 43)		737,319 00
Miscellaneous, (page 43)		187,360 66
Actual expenses		1,694,637 70
Proposed appropriation for like purposes only for the coming fiscal year, ending June 30, 1875		2,600,000 00
Increase the coming fiscal year over the expenses of the fiscal year 1873		905,362 30

The next paragraph is embraced in lines 492 to 496 inclusive, page 21, "for detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws, or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violations, $100,000." On page 44, Fifth Auditor's report, the amount paid for these purposes for fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, was but $39,371.94; thus this item is increased $60,628.06—more than double.

One more reference to the details of this printed bill under consideration and I will close.

On page 69, in what I may call the summary of the amount recommended to be appropriated in the bill and the purposes for which it is classified, I find the following figures:

Object.	Appropriated, 1873–'74.	Recommended, 1874–'75.
For office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue	$354,140 00	$308,380 00
For enforcement of revenue laws	150,000 00	100,000 00
For collectors and assessors of internal revenue	5,600,000 00	4,590,000 00
For dies, paper, and stamps	400,000 00	400,000 00
Totals	6,504,140 00	5,398,380 00

Upon examination of the act of March 3, 1873, I find the following as the correct amounts therein appropriated:

For office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue	$354,140 00
For enforcement of revenue laws	100,000 00
For collectors and assessors of internal revenue	4,600,000 00
For dies, paper, and stamps	400,000 00
Total	5,454,140 00

A difference of $1,050,000; showing the true statement of the amount to be—

Appropriations for 1873	$5,454,140 00
Proposed amount under present bill	5,398,922 00
Actual reduction	55,218 00

Instead of the sum shown by the figures—$1,105,218.

In concluding, I want to say to the House that I have brought great industry to this subject in the desire to be accurate in figures, fair in my premises, and logical in my results, with no political object in view, preferring to join hands with all members of either side who desire that the expenses of the Government shall be reduced to the lowest possible figure. To make sure as to the accuracy of my figures, I have called to my assistance the services of gentlemen well versed in the laws and familiar with the detail of the administration of the Internal-Revenue and Treasury Departments, not relying entirely on my own resources or my own knowledge. I trust the chairman [Mr. GARFIELD] will give the facts and figures I have presented a careful review, and, if possible, make his reductions still more, and try and approximate to the amounts I have shown as quite sufficient for the purposes embraced in this bill.

CONDITION OF MR. SUMNER.

During the delivery of Mr. RANDALL'S speech he yielded to have the following telegram read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1874.

Hon. JAS. G. BLAINE, Speaker of House of Representatives:

No material change in Mr. SUMNER'S condition. His physicians think him sinking slowly. I think he will survive your session of to-day.

E. R. HOAR.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the committee but a short time in the discussion of this bill.

We find, as we proceed with the debate, that we are getting information that is of great value. The statement of facts, tables, and analysis submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] who has just taken his seat, present valuable information, and I join hands most cordially in any effort, from any quarter, that shall look to a reduction in a fair way of the expenditures of the Government. And while I do not agree entirely with all he has said, such a speech deserves careful consideration.

GREAT CARE TAKEN TO REDUCE EXPENDITURES.

The Committee on Appropriations, after the most careful examination of the various Departments of the Government, and after having the officials in charge of every Department and Bureau before them, have determined that in those Departments of the Government where there is not an increase of business there shall be a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent. The analysis of the bill will show this. For instance, where there have been ten Bureaus in the Treasury Department we struck out three. Where "slush-money," so called, was paid we struck it away and reformed it altogether, abolished it entirely. In the Treasury Department alone we reduce the number of clerks three hundred and seventy, and thus save in salaries of employés nearly half a million dollars.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you not increase by direct appropriation the salaries of those who received the "slush-money" heretofore?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The bill provides for paying them considerably less than has heretofore been paid.

UNFOUNDED ACCUSATIONS.

Allow me now to advert to an observation made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] He complains because the business of this House has not been pushed forward. I think the gentleman has no right to complain. If the members of this House on either side, even the leading members, if you please, had taken the same time that has been wasted, and worse than wasted, in idle accusations by the gentleman from Kentucky—mere accusations, unsustained by facts or evidence—we should have done little business in this House. Let the gentleman remember the passage in a very old book about his duty to remove the beam from his own eye, before he talks about the mote in his brother's eye. Why, the gentleman comes in here from his own committee and takes two hours in his arraignment. The next day, as a substitute on the Committee on Appropriations, he takes the time of the House for two hours more in the place of a leading member of that committee of his own party. And no man on that side of the House from the Committee on Appropriations has been heard, because the gentleman from Kentucky not only appropriated the time of his own committee, but the time of the Committee on Appropriations. And when we were here a few days ago, anxious to advance the business of the country, the gentleman insisted in its interruption, in order that his colleague [Mr. BROWN] might deliver a long speech on the civil-rights bill, which was not then before the House for discussion, after the subject had been discussed three weeks, and after a large portion of that time had been occupied by the gentlemen on that side of the House.

The gentlemen on the other side remind me of the reply of Mr. Lincoln, in the Legislature, of Illinois, to a member who was always discovering (like some of our democratic friends) attacks on the Constitution. I give a short extract from Mr. Lincoln's speech:

The attack of the member from Wabash on the constitutionality of this measure reminds me of an old friend of mine. He is a peculiar-looking old fellow, with shaggy, overhanging eyebrows and a pair of spectacles under them. [Everybody turned to the member from Wabash and recognized a personal description.] One morning, just after the old man got up, he imagined, on looking out of his door, that he saw rather a lively squirrel on a tree near his house, so he took down his rifle and fired at the squirrel, but the squirrel paid no attention to the shot. He loaded and fired again, and again, until the thirteenth shot; he set down his gun impatiently and said to his boy, who was looking on, "Boy, there's something wrong about this rifle." "Rifle's all right; I know 'tis," replied the boy; "but where's your squirrel?" "Don't you see him humped up about half way up the tree?" inquired the old man, peeping over his spectacles and getting mystified. "No, I don't," responded the boy; and then, turning and looking into his father's face, he exclaimed, "I see your squirrel! You have been firing at a louse on your eyebrow!"

I refer to the story, hoping the gentleman will consider it well and be benefited by a personal application. You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that the marksman fired his rifle only thirteen times. The gentleman would have beaten this, but his ammunition is exhausted.

THE ABUSES ARE THE OUTGROWTH OF DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION.

The abuses the gentleman from Kentucky is aiming at are not in the direction he supposes. They are nearer home, and are the abuses of his own party, and perhaps the gentleman is more to blame for them than any man in his party. Now let me test the gentleman's economy. He is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. The Committee on Appropriations went through every Department until we came to the Internal Revenue Bureau. The gentleman from Kentucky was going to investigate that himself. He went with another member of the Committee on Ways and Means to that Department and went through all the branches of the service, and when they came back they reported that they could not see how there could be a reduction of a single clerk in the Internal Revenue Bureau. We have had enough of his professions; there was an opportunity for a practical application. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that it is our duty to reduce there as well as elsewhere, and in the bill reported we have made a reduction. This is true, however, of the Internal Revenue Bureau, that by taking away the assessors from the service some little new labor has been thrown on it, but, notwithstanding that additional labor, I agree entirely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and voted in committee for a reduction, notwithstanding the report of the gentleman from Kentucky that no reduction was practicable in that Department.

Mr. RANDALL. There are two thousand less quarterly and monthly reports to be made to the Internal Revenue Department proper than there were in 1866.

Mr. BURCHARD. Allow me to suggest that the examination of those accounts is made by the Auditor.

Mr. RANDALL. That only shows that there is more reason for a reduction in the force of the Internal Revenue Department.

THE REDUCTIONS ARE LARGE.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I must hasten on. I have taken great pains to examine the appropriations recommended by our committee this year. In the Army bill we have reduced the original estimates $4,791,800; in the naval bill, $2,853,917.21; in the fortification bill, $2,647,000; saving, $10,292,717.21.

While the fortification bill which I reported was under discussion, I said:

The estimates at first submitted by the proper Department for continuing the work on our fortifications and sea-coast defenses for the next fiscal year were $3,601,000. These estimates were made with a view to placing our fortifications in a more complete condition of efficiency, in contemplation of the emergency that was impending a few months since. But when it was suggested by Congress on assembling that the depression in the finances of the country called for a revision of estimates, the War Department and the Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys, with a most commendable spirit, seconded the wishes of Congress in the line of economy, and by a thorough revision reduced the estimates to $1,407,500.

Since then the Committee on Appropriations, after repeated conferences with General Humphreys, and on a careful examination of every item in the estimates, and with his hearty co-operation, have reduced them to $994,000, the amount proposed to be appropriated in this bill.

The amount heretofore appropriated has often been much larger, and it has been generally most wisely expended. Compared with any year before the war even, when labor was cheap, the appropriation this year is a successful effort in the line of economy.

Take a few years by way of comparison:

In 1836 there were appropriated for fortifications	$1,710,000
In 1847	1,570,000
In 1854	1,134,573
In 1855	1,010,500
In 1856	1,842,600
In 1857	1,818,300

During the war large sums were appropriated, some years amounting to several millions.

For the last three years the amount appropriated is as follows:

1871	$1,211,500
1872	1,322,000
1873	1,847,000

The bill was passed precisely as I reported it, except on my motion two amendments were made reducing the bill $40,000, leaving the appropriation only $954,000; and of this amount less than $800,000 was for fortifications proper, the balance being for surveys and other services in the interest of economy, in furnishing cheaper lines of transportation for Army supplies and facilities for the settlement of the Territories, and in opening up their great wealth of mineral resources to the people of the whole country.

Here we have, then, in the three bills already passed by the House, a saving on the original estimates of $10,292,717.21. And still the gentleman from Kentucky "is not happy."

In this bill we reduced from the bill reported last year $4,776,307.56. And "still he is not happy."

If we go forward in this line of economy, as I have no doubt we shall, then, under existing laws, all the expenses of the Government will be paid, together with the interest on the public debt, and there will be at least a balance of $25,000,000 to apply on the payment of the principal.

In this connection, I desire to quote from the very able speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] a leading member of the Committee on Ways and Means, only desiring to say in addition that the receipts can be, I think, safely put at $320,000,000, under existing laws.

Mr. ROBERTS said:

Observe that the reduction of the debt for February exceeds the requirements of the sinking fund. The excess is not large, but it exists, and it is most significant. It may fairly be increased by the item of "old interest" above. And the receipts of to-day indicate even a better result for the current month.

FISCAL YEAR 1874-'75.

For the next fiscal year, 1874-'75, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates the receipts at $305,700,000. They can safely be put at $315,000,000, if not more, under present laws. The expenditures, including the demands for the sinking fund, are placed at $319,191,000; but the disposition of Congress has been proved to keep them below $300,000,000.

Three of the regular appropriation bills have passed this House, and in each case sturdy effort for retrenchment was cordially sustained. The Secretary's report had the same basis as the original estimates submitted to Congress. In the naval bill, which the able gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] so successfully carried through the House, the sum appropriated is $2,853,917.21 less than the original estimates, and about $853,917 less than the revised estimates. So in the Army appropriation bill, of which my eminent and faithful colleague [Mr. WHEELER] had charge, the sum voted is $4,791,800 less than the original estimates, and $4,466,800 less than the revised estimates; and I appeal to my colleague to know if the House did not with alacrity follow his brave and efficient lead. The other example is the fortification bill, reported by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] in which a reduction of $2,647,000 is made below the original, and $453,000 below the revised estimates; and the total appropriated, $954,000, is about one-half the expenditure of last year, and of several of the years preceding the war. For example, the appropriations were—

In 1836	$1,710,000
In 1856	1,842,600
In 1871	1,211,500
In 1872	1,322,000
In 1873	1,847,000
For 1874	954,000

Not only has the House generously supported the Appropriation Committee in every regular bill, but in the case of fortifications it clipped $40,000 from the bill as reported.

These three bills show a saving, as compared with the original estimates:

Navy bill	$2,853,917 21
Army bill	4,791,800 00
Fortification bill	2,647,000 00
Saving	10,292,717 21

In the bill already reported to the House the reductions recommended by the committee are, in the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, $3,953,730.60 as compared with the estimates, and $4,776,307.56 as compared with last year.

The Departments ask this year for only $2,312,839.78 for deficiencies, against $6,116,677.39 last year. So that the reductions already indicated, as compared with the basis of the Secretary's estimates for next year, are already $17,049,285.49.

What the House has done is specific, tangible work; and we need more of it in the bills yet to be reported. Doubtless the House and the Committee on Appropriations will complete a reduction of $25,000,000, or even more, from the original estimates. That will justify the confidence that the credit balance for the next fiscal year will exceed $20,000,000.

But the gentleman "is not happy;" and I cannot repress the conviction that has been made in his series of remarkable speeches, remarkable chiefly for an absence of fair criticism, that he is most worried because these bills are economical beyond any reported for years, and, in comparison with the demands of the public service, more economical than under any administration before the war.

HIS ARITHMETIC IS AT FAULT.

The gentleman should now admit his mistakes, for all his high-sounding accusations have signally failed of proof. His little mistake of $30,000,000 is perfectly apparent to any man who will take pains to investigate.

Where, then, are his charges that "the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has deceived the country?" Where are his innuendoes that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] "had been silenced in the interest of his party?" The immense balloon that the gentleman from Kentucky had inflated never rose above the dead level of his own unsustained assertions. It has utterly collapsed.

Take another assertion of this gentleman to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] replied yesterday. That statement was, in short, that there was appropriated for the expenses of the Indian Department for the present fiscal year, by the bill of last Congress, $8,000,000.

The gentleman from Missouri shows by a careful and exact statement of the facts, giving all the figures in detail, that, instead of $8,000,000, as asserted by the gentleman from Kentucky, it was only $5,441,518; another little mistake of over two and a half million dollars. The gentleman from Kentucky as an arithmetician is not a success. And this blundering comes of talking of matters of which he knows little.

How much better and more in accordance with usage would it have been for the gentleman to have left a little time in this discussion to the three able gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations of his own party, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] and the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK.] Each of them has been constant in his attendance in the committee, and I say with great pleasure that they have ably and cordially supported every effort in the line of a wise economy. They could have informed the gentleman from Kentucky of the facts, being conversant with the whole subject. Or else he should have examined carefully before making the charge that the chairman of the committee had "deceived the country."

A modest blush he wears, not formed by art;
And thus with manly modesty he spoke.

THESE BLUNDERS "RETURN TO PLAGUE THE INVENTOR."

But how does the gentleman from Kentucky treat the grave mistake of $30,000,000? Why, he persisted through ten days of debate here, on one side and the other, in his misstatement of facts, asserting that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] "had been silenced in the interest of his party," and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] had deceived the country.

The gentleman from Massachusetts called him to an account for his statement, and I ask the House and the country to observe his reply:

Mr. DAWES. I understood the gentleman to say that the gentleman from Ohio had silenced me because I was glad to be silenced in the interest of my party.

Mr. BECK. If I used the word "because," it was wrong. What I intended to say was, I had no doubt the gentleman was very glad to be silenced, and it was very proper that he should be if he could, for the good of his party. I take back the "because."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky does not quite do me justice in that respect, nor does he do the gentleman from Ohio justice, or else I suffer a good deal unreasonably. I admitted upon the floor of the House that the gentleman from Ohio was correct. I have since examined the figures, and I am still of opinion that the gentleman from Ohio was correct, with the exception that he accidentally stated the sinking fund to be $43,000,000, when in point of fact it was $29,000,000. With that exception I am still of opinion, after a careful revision of all his figures, that the gentleman from Ohio was correct in saying this, that in my comparison of the expenditures year after year I stated them correctly; but when I came to the appropriations of this year—not the expenditures of this year, because the year had not ended—I did not include the sinking fund in past years, although it was included in the appropriations for this year.

I was glad to be corrected to that extent, wherever I was mistaken. I was desirous of being absolutely correct and accurate. And if I had done injustice anywhere I was very glad to be corrected.

Note the reply. "If I used the word 'because,' it was wrong;" and added subsequently, "my time is limited." How ingenuous! The two hours spent in unfounded accusations, and no time to correct a misstatement of facts! And this is the exhibition to the end of his speech.

He that hath been often told his fault
And still persists, is as impertinent
As a musician that will always play,
And yet is always out at the same note.

ECONOMY ALWAYS IN ORDER.

In every bill reported from our committee we have made important reductions, and we shall go on in that spirit to the end. It may be impossible to make much reduction in the Post-Office Department, owing to our extended lines of communication, with the postal-order system and other new branches of service which are for the accommodation of the country; but reduction is the order of the day, and I am proud to say that this republican party, about which we hear so much complaint by the gentleman from Kentucky, has in every year of its progress inaugurated these great reforms.

ALL REFORM THE WORK OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to recall a few of these reforms, as well as its great achievements during the war.

In the ranks of the republican party there was not found one enemy of the Republic. That party won imperishable honor in defense of the nation's life and in the maintenance of the nation's integrity. It gave emancipation, citizenship, enfranchisement, and civil rights to a race outraged and oppressed for two hundred years. In all the world no party ever had so grand a record. It has given free homesteads to the people; it has by its national highways spanned a continent; united the two great oceans of the world; brought China, the Indies, and the wealth of the Orient nearer to us by half the circuit of the globe; it has opened an immense zone of our dominion, teeming with agricultural and mineral wealth, to settlement and civilization, and made forever indissoluble this Union of States.

Is it nothing that, by negotiation, the administration of President Grant has, within the last few years, settled the right of expatriation, and accomplished what had baffled the diplomacy and statesmanship of every Administration for half a century, and which had cost us the war of 1812, and was then further than ever from settlement? Is it nothing that this Administration has secured important rights by negotiation with all the principal commercial nations of the globe? Is it nothing that a peaceable, Christian policy has been inaugurated in our dealings with the Indians, by which needless wars shall be avoided and millions saved to the Treasury? Is it nothing that this Administration, by peaceable arbitration, settled the Alabama claims and secured $15,000,000 as compensation, and avoided a war that would have cost many millions? Is it nothing that this Administration is going forward by a steady and sure progress in securing a most efficient civil service?

What further reforms have been accomplished by a republican Congress? The mileage was a great abuse. A republican Congress has done this. It has cut off constructive mileage, reduced it one half, and limited it to one mileage a session. The next step will soon be taken, and it will be abolished altogether.

What next? We limited executive authority and extended the power of the people, in the tenure of office act.

We provided cheap postage for the people at home, and reduced largely the foreign-postage charges in the interest of our naturalized citizens. What party before ever did so well?

What next? For the security of our Treasury, and in the interest of economy, we passed an act covering undrawn balances into the Treasury.

We abolished the spirit rations in the Navy, and provided wholesome food in the place of grog.

Then we have provided by our legislation for payment of pensions to all the disabled Union soldiers, amounting to $30,000,000 a year.

What further? Under an old law abuses had arisen under every Administration in regard to refunding customs duties by the Secretary of the Treasury. While the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] the other day was speaking, a bill was prepared withdrawing the power and correcting this abuse.

These are but a tithe of the reforms accomplished by a republican President and a radical Congress. And still we go forward to new fields of reform.

Look over our wide domain. Our internal water-communication, under the power given in the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States, has, by our legislation for the improvement of our rivers and harbors, been advanced more in the last eight years than for eighty years before. And by a significant vote in this House within the last few days the republican majority stood in solid column, asserting the right of Congress to interfere to prevent any railroad corporation, or combination of corporations, from laying exorbitant and oppressive burdens on the people, thus showing that the republican party is willing to meet the issues before us and go forward in all great reforms.

Look again along our coasts. What do we see? You see breakwaters, harbors of refuge, life-saving stations, and a light-house system unequaled on the face of the globe. Here, again, more has been accomplished in the last few years than in eighty years before.

Look again over our vast domain, twenty times larger than the original thirteen States, and you see, almost without exception, the daily mail sent to every village in the land, and to the remotest hamlet on the frontiers; and this is increased as the business requires and population increases to a dozen mails a day, with postal-car service. To this has been added the money-order system, our best and cheapest reform of this century. Does anybody here wish to go back to the weekly mail and the old postal facilities? If so, he should organize a new party without a day's delay.

All this costs something, it is true. You cannot build a railway across a continent, nor improve our rivers and harbors, nor make harbors of refuge, nor erect life-saving stations, nor light up five thousand miles of sea-coast, nor pay pensions, without money.

All this expenditure is well, if wisely applied. It pays a hundredfold in the substantial advancement of the nation in material prosperity.

ONE MISTAKE.

The last Congress, in the judgment of the country, made one mistake. It was in the increase of our salaries. That mistake this Congress has already corrected. But let it not be forgotten that a majority of the republican members of the House voted against that increase, while a majority of the democrats voted for the bill.

But this Congress has, in all its legislation, exercised the most scrupulous care, and not a single bill that has the slightest color of a job has found the least encouragement this session. This assures the country that its interests and honor are secure.

NEW FIELDS OF REFORM.

Mr. Chairman, we must still go forward into new fields of reform, and correct other abuses of long standing, the legacy of former Administrations.

First. We must cut up the system of moieties, root and branch, and require the regular officers of the Government to collect the revenues faithfully. This old abuse must be speedily reformed.

Secondly. We must reduce the expenses of the customs collection, by limiting salaries and abolishing needless offices.

Thirdly. We must reduce the salaries of such pension agents and other officials as are receiving unreasonable compensation in salaries and perquisites.

Fourthly. We must, by further legislation, provide guarantees against "straw bids" in the mail-contract service.

Fifthly. The proper committee should at once report a bill disposing of all the Government arsenals except three, and there should be a sale of the property, and the avails covered into the Treasury. These are the outgrowth of old and pernicious legislation, and by correcting these abuses several millions may annually be saved.

I have indicated these reforms. There are others already accomplished this session.

By the legislation of the last Congress we reduced the expenses of collecting the internal revenue more than one million dollars.

The following table, handed me by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] shows how largely the number of officers of the Internal Revenue Bureau has been reduced. From that table it appears that on the 1st of December, 1866, there were employed by the Internal Revenue Bureau 8,599 persons, and on the 1st of December, 1873, 3,533 persons. The entire table is as follows:

ECONOMY WITHOUT PARSIMONY.

Mr. Chairman, if this Congress will sustain the Committee on Appropriations, I am confident that the expenditures will be so reduced that we will not only pay the interest on the public debt and all the expenses of the Government, but we shall have something left to pay a portion of the principal of the public debt. I am not alarmed; I do not think there is any necessity of our being so parsimonious that we cannot carry on the Government in a spirit of progress. We shall raise money enough by the taxes already imposed to keep the wheels of the Government going in a wise, orderly, systematic, and economical manner. There is need, and there always will be need, of economy. This is a great country; and while its necessities are large, its resources are unbounded; and what we have done in the way of expenditures has been done wisely, in opening our highways of commerce, and advancing the true interest and prosperity of the whole country—it has been in the building of light-houses and life-saving stations, and in inaugurating all those great reforms the benefit of which the country has secured through an honest administration of the Government by the republican party. Pass what criticisms you please, let them come from what quarter you please, whenever the matter is taken up and fully examined, whenever we get rid of idle clamor without facts or figures to sustain it and go before the people, they will sustain us in the future as they have done in the past, so long as we are true to the principles of the republican party. Our watchword has been, and is, "Equal rights for all, special privileges to none;" economy, progress, and honest administration. No truer words have ever been uttered than those spoken by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] when he said that the republican party was born in the spirit of reform, and that it had administered the Government in the spirit of reform, and had its origin in the reform and overthrow of all abuses.

When the gentleman was discussing the question of refunding customs duties, I asked him if this was not the exercise of an old power by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now mark his reply:

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly it is an old power. I am arraigning no man for originating this power over the Treasury. It has come down to us from other Administrations, and we are responsible only for its continuance. And I might as well now say that I am not here to-day to arraign the republican party, but only to urge it to take hold of the work of reforming and improving old systems and methods, which have been inherited, not created, by it.

The republican party had its origin in the reform and overthrow of old abuses. It will forget its mission only when it ceases to search them out and abolish them. No other party before it had either the courage or the power to work out reforms within its own organization. It is the glory of the republican party that it probes its own sores and corrects its own errors. It has never waited to be driven from without to a discharge of its duty, but, impelled by the very purpose of its being, it has shrunk from no self-discipline, nor hesitated in the application of the most radical reform. It is in this spirit that I speak to-day, arraigning nobody, but seeking, if possible, for better methods of administration than those which the country has outgrown, or experience has proven unwise.

Almost before the conclusion of his remarks this republican Congress swept this whole abuse from the statute-books, thus giving emphasis to the gentleman's declaration, that it "administered the Government in the spirit of reform."

This speech of the gentleman from Kentucky is the same he has made annually for the last five years, and it, as well as the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] is conceived in the same spirit as those delivered by the latter gentleman during all the war. It was then predicted that the rebellion could never be suppressed, that the national credit was ruined, and the nation hopelessly bankrupt. These are the men who are responsible for the national debt. It was such encouragement as they gave that kept alive the hopes of the rebellion and prolonged the war. They were thus in everything with the enemies of the country, or at least only gave to their country a hesitating support, facing North one day and South the next—one day wearing the Union blue, and the next the rebel gray.

THEY CANNOT AFFORD COMPARISON.

These unfounded charges of extravagance come with an ill grace from these gentlemen. It has become a part of the history of the democratic party—one of its great failures—that under the administration of their last Chief Executive, Mr. Buchanan, in a time of peace, with no extraordinary demands on the Treasury, they contracted a national debt of millions, had to borrow money at an extravagant rate of interest, and by their utter inefficiency the rebels plundered the Treasury, treason and disloyalty held high carnival, and the nation was humbled in the eyes of the world.

IT WAS THEIR WORK.

The gentlemen of the Opposition complain of our national debt, the loss of our commerce, and of our large pension-list. The democratic party is responsible for all this. No republican advised "sending arms to the rebels;" no republican fitted out piratical cruisers to burn our unprotected and unarmed vessels; no republican convention declared the war for the preservation of the Union "a failure." I dislike to recall these unpleasant incidents of the war to the sensitive heart of the gentleman from New York, who complains now of a national debt and of taxation to pay Union soldiers. The democratic leaders North were then, as now, in sympathy, all wrong, while the masses were right; and every dollar of debt, every pension-list, every tax bill, every maimed and wounded veteran North and South, every soldier's grave, and every desolate hearthstone, is an unanswerable and undying protest against the return of the democratic leaders to power.

THEIR FAILURE UNDER BUCHANAN.

Under Mr. Buchanan's administration the debt increased in time of peace enormously, and when Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated, in 1861, the public debt was ninety millions, and there was a deficit in the Treasury of more than seventy millions.

The first act of the last session of Congress under Buchanan's administration was to issue Treasury notes to meet the expenditures; and almost the last act of that session was by act of March 20, 1861, to provide for the payment of outstanding Treasury notes. And we have been compelled at the present session, in the straitened condition of our finances, to pay this loan; and on the 1st of last January we had to pay the fifteen-year bonds that were put on the market in 1858 by Buchanan's administration.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said in his speech the other day, "It was one of the evidences of the decay of that party. It was dying of dry-rot."

And yet these dead men persist in sitting up in their coffins and giving lectures on political economy!

TWINS—TWEED AND TAMMANY.

Who does not know, also, the shameful record of the democratic party in that democratic city of New York? Stealing from the treasury became the rule rather than the exception. The democratic party applauded and defended Tweed, elected him to most honorable and lucrative positions, received part of the plunder to keep up the national and State organizations, and honored him by making him chief of Tammany. And this continued until the leading republican journals aroused the people and overthrew the conspirators. Then Tammany Hall deserted the man who had contributed millions from the plundered people to keep up the democratic organization, and poor Tweed was left to perform hospital duty, "Woody" and his co-conspirators are in exile, and the democratic party mourn their absence and the loss of material aid on election day.

Everywhere there are unmistakable warnings that it is unsafe to trust them again in power.

THE TIDAL WAVE RECEDES.

Mr. Chairman, since the organization of the republican party in 1856 the political prophets of the Opposition have predicted, with every changing season, our defeat, disintegration, and annihilation. They have, on sundry and divers occasions, seen the "tidal wave" on which they were to be borne back to place and power. But one by one these glorious visions have failed, and the receding wave has left them without success or hope.

As a party, they have long since abandoned all their own distinctive democratic principles. Two years ago they nominated and supported Mr. Greeley, and gave in a hesitating allegiance to the entire policy of the republican party, even the reconstruction measures and civil rights. Since then they have gone back on their pledges, solemnly made in national convention, and now deny to the black man civil rights. Indeed, they adhere to nothing but their old prejudices against the oppressed race.

Their party organization is broken, and the leaders agree on no question of public policy.

All shrewd observers must see that a party which was wrong during all the war; that opposed every measure of reconstruction; that opposed emancipation, equal rights and enfranchisements, and which now denies to four million freemen their rights, can never regain control of the national Government. They may gain here and there temporary success. They may win an election occasionally in the East on some issue of prohibition, or a victory in the Northwest by shouting "Hay-seed!" "Hay-seed!" But after the election is over they vote here in Congress on every occasion in the interest of railroad combinations and oppressive rates of transportation.

AN INTERESTING SPECTACLE.

And here in this House, a few days since, as I have before stated, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] his colleague, [Mr. BROWN,] in a speech reeking with abuse of the President and the republican party, that had just voted complete amnesty to him and all his companions in the rebellion, insults the memory and the patriotism of our dead Union soldiers, and for nearly two hours commends the spirit which inaugurated the rebellion. The whole tone and temper of his speech has the direct tendency to bring on again civil war and rebellion, in which he would doubtless, as before, advise that every Union soldier that should go to the defense of the Government "should be shot before he leaves the State."

This letter gives a better idea of his speech than any comments that can be made, and shall be its own interpretation. It is as follows:

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editors Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said, in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South, 'I would not send one solitary man to aid the Government; and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks.'"

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the Confederate States. What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern Army shall attempt to cross our borders, we will resist it until death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them, he ought, and I believe will, be shot down before he leaves the State."

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm, as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered publicly and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully,

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

And this is put forth here as the true spirit of democracy in that most reliable democratic State, Kentucky. This speech is the best version and exponent of democratic principles.

I would not have brought this speech to the notice of the House at this time, except for the fact that it has been announced in the public journals that it was made for distribution in Connecticut during the pending canvass, and is now being circulated there.

It is an insult to the patriotism of the country, and should be rebuked. When the purpose of this speech is understood, I am confident that the people of Connecticut will see that such teachings are unworthy of support, and that the leaders of the democratic party are still wedded to the "pestilent heresy of secession."

The old rebel leaders are in command, sailing under the flag of the "lost cause." Out into the Dead Sea goes their rebel cruiser, "painted and perfidious—a coffin, but not a ship." It challenges no respect, and can win no victories.

WHAT THE COUNTRY NEEDS.

The country needs peace. The States recently in rebellion need time to recover from the devastation of war. And there is nothing to prevent this except the insane folly of a few disappointed leaders who inaugurated the rebellion, and drove their misguided people into a needless war.

Governed by a magnanimity unparalleled in the history of the world, President Grant and the republican party extended to them amnesty, and have encouraged, by every means in their power, the return of peaceful relations between all sections of the Union.

Here and there occasionally are heard expressions of discontent, engendered by the teachings of men like Jefferson Davis, the late president of the Confederate States. They seem unmindful of the great wrong they have done in their betrayal of the Government and the distress they have brought on their misguided followers.

Except for the pernicious influence of these men we should have, under the wise and beneficent administration of President Grant, peace and prosperity everywhere.

But they will not long deceive the people, and the best men in the democratic party have left, and will continue to leave, a cause so unworthy of confidence.

With so grand a record the republican party in the future will go forward and manfully meet every duty of the hour. Let us adhere rigidly, as we have begun this session, to economy in appropriations and expenditures, and we may be certain that all the expenses of the Government will be met, together with the interest on the public debt; and, on the revival of business, I predict confidently we shall reduce our public debt the next fiscal year at least $25,000,000.

Through years of patient, self-sacrificing service the great Lincoln bore the calumnies and slanders of those public journals that thrive on falsehood. But a grateful nation mourned with inexpressible tenderness his loss, and bears his name in everlasting remembrance. His name is honored now wherever liberty is cherished in all lands.

History repeats itself. In the hands of that magnanimous, earnest, faithful man, the present Chief Executive of the nation, rest securely the interests of all the people; and when this deluge of detraction and false accusation has passed, the verdict of impartial history will place the soldier President high on the list of the great statesmen of the Republic.

Mr. DAWES. I have here a table in the line of the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER.] It is a statement of the comparative number of the persons employed by the Internal Revenue Bureau on the 1st of December, 1866, and on the 1st of December, 1873.

Mr. COX. That table is already in print, in answer to a resolution which I offered.

Mr. DAWES. From that table it appears that on the 1st of December, 1866, there were employed by the Internal Revenue Bureau eighty-five hundred and ninety-nine persons, and on the 1st of December, 1873, thirty-five hundred and thirty-three persons. The entire table is as follows:

Collectors, up to June 30, 1873, except in a few cases, when, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, the salary and commissions were not sufficient to pay expenses and allow a fair personal compensation, were paid $1,500 per annum and commissions. In all districts since that date, collectors have been given special allowance in lieu of salary and commissions allowed by law.

Deputy collectors are paid by the collectors, this office exercising a general supervision over the question of allowances for their pay, which range from $500 to $2,250 per annum; the higher salaries being confined to a few deputies in city districts paying a large revenue.

Assessors were paid by salary of $1,500, and commissions on excess of revenue over $100,000, not exceeding in all $4,000 per annum. In a few cases, where the amount of commissions was small, additional salary was allowed to give them a reasonable salary, under proviso of section 22, act of June 30, 1864.

Special agents were paid an average salary of $5.50 per diem and expenses, and a moiety as informer, whereby a fine, penalty, or forfeiture, was secured to the Government.

In 1866 the pay of revenue agents averaged $2,200 per annum and expenses, and a moiety as informer, &c. In 1873 their average pay was $7 per diem and just and necessary traveling expenses.

Fourteen surveyors of distilleries receive $6 per diem and traveling expenses; the balance are deputy collectors, who receive only actual expenses incurred in making surveys.

Supervisors receive $3,000 and expenses.

One deputy commissioner at $3,500, two at $3,000 per annum.

Salary of Solicitor $4,000 per annum. This office was transferred to Department of Justice by act approved June 22, 1870.

* By act approved December 24, 1872, the Commissioner was authorized to designate one of the heads of divisions as chief clerk, without additional compensation.

Mr. RANDALL. I know the table to which the gentleman refers, and I desire to state that most of my figures were taken from that statement.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Wherever we get facts and figures we find this to be true: that the republican party has been on the line of economy and reform, and are so still more than ever.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. KELLOGG. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have fifteen minutes. And then the last fifteen minutes allowed by the House for general debate on this bill will be given the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

[Mr. KELLOGG proceeded to address the committee. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. DAWES. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF SENATOR SUMNER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following telegram this moment received.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senator SUMNER died almost without a struggle at ten minutes before three.

Mr. DAWES, (at three o'clock p. m.) Mr. Speaker, in view of this sad intelligence, I move the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House stands adjourned until twelve o'clock m. to-morrow.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers, were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of 93 citizens of Carroll County, Maryland, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee, in opposition to any increase in internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duty on certain foreign imports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of G. W. Ford, of Cecil County, Maryland, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of 32 citizens of Maryland, for the early settlement and payment of the claim of the Southern Methodist publishing house, at Nashville, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CLAYTON: Resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, in relation to Chinese immigration, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of citizens of Ashtabula, Ohio, for an appropriation of the full amount of the estimates of the Engineer Department for the improvement of Ashtabula Harbor, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MILLS: The memorial of Mrs. Ella P. Murphy, for relief, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ROSS: The petition of 37 workingmen of Crescent Iron Works, at Williamsport, Pennsylvania, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee, in opposition to any increase in internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on foreign imports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SHELDON: The petition of the children and heirs of Peter Raggio, deceased, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

THURSDAY, March 12, 1874.

DEATH OF MR. SUMNER.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, offered up the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Father in heaven, we all do fade as a leaf before Thee; one generation cometh and another goeth; and so Thou standest this day to plead with this Thy great people. Two honored heads lie low, and the sighing of sister cities responding in their grief is heard in all the land. The grave must receive her own; we bow in silence and submission to Thy stroke; Christ is our only shield. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator to whom this saddest duty appertains, and who is detained from the Senate by illness, the surviving Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] I have been requested to make to you the formal announcement of an event which my heart refuses to accept and which my lips hesitate to declare. It is an event which needs not to be announced, for its dark shadow rests gloomily upon this Chamber, and not only upon the Senate and the capital, but upon the whole country; and the intelligence of which, borne on the mysterious wires that underlie the seas, has been already carried to the remotest lands, and has aroused profoundest sympathy wherever Humanity weeps for a friend, wherever Liberty deplores an advocate.

The oldest member of this body in continuous service—he who yesterday was the oldest—beloved for the graces and the virtues of his personal character, admired for his genius and his accomplishments, reverenced for the fidelity with which he adhered to his convictions, illustrious for his services to the Republic and to the world, has crossed the dark river that divides us from the "undiscovered country."

CHARLES SUMNER died yesterday. To-day, in humble submission to the divine will, we meet to express our respect for his character, our veneration for his memory. To-morrow, with solemn steps and with sorrowing hearts, we shall bear him to the Massachusetts which he served so faithfully, and which loved him so well; and to her soil, precious with the dust of patriotism and of valor, of letters and of art, of statesmanship and of eloquence, we shall commit the body of one who is worthy to rest by the side of the noblest and the best of those who in the century of her history have made her the model of a free commonwealth.

But the great deeds which illustrated his life shall not be buried with him, and never shall the earth cover the immortal principles to which he devoted every energy of his soul, the consummation and vindication of which, as his highest reward, a gracious God permitted him to witness.

Mr. President, this is not the time, nor is the office mine, to pronounce the words that are due to this event. A future hour and more fitting utterances shall interpret to the American people the affectionate respect of the Senate to our dead associate, the homage which it renders to his life and character.

Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee of —— members be appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore, to take order for superintending the funeral of CHARLES SUMNER, late a member of this body, which will take place to-morrow (Friday) at half-past twelve; and that the Senate will attend the same.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect entertained by the Senate for the memory of CHARLES SUMNER, and his long and distinguished services to his country, that his remains be removed to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and attended by a committee of —— Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SCHURZ. I can say nothing to-day, but offer the following as an amendment to the resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives, and invite the House of Representatives to attend the funeral ceremony in the Senate Chamber to-morrow, at half-past twelve o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the absence of a committee of the Senate to follow the bier to-day of one who once presided here is enough alone to warn us of the fitness of pausing for a space from the din and business of life. It was my purpose to move that the Senate adjourn in observance of the funeral of Mr. FILLMORE; but meanwhile we are covered by the shadow of a nearer grief. A vacant chair is here, long held by a Senator of distinguished eminence, and one of the most illustrious of Americans. Surely it is fit that we should arrest the business of the Senate, and pay tribute to the long and remarkable life now closed. No honor will be paid to the dead statesman in which I would not join in sincerity and respect, and I second the resolutions moved by the Senator from Rhode Island without attempting to add a word to the graceful and eloquent thoughts which have fallen from him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on filling the blanks in the resolution. With what number shall they be filled?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was thought advisable not to state the number, but to leave it in the discretion of the Chair. On consultation with the gentlemen from Massachusetts of the other House, that was thought advisable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolutions as modified?

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate stands adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 12, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR SUMNER.

Mr. GORHAM, Secretary of the Senate, (at twelve o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) appeared at the bar and said: I am directed by the Senate to communicate to the House of Representatives the proceedings of the Senate on the announcement of the death of Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, late a Senator from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 12, 1874.

Resolved, That a committee of —— members be appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore, to take order for superintending the funeral of CHARLES SUMNER, late a member of this body, which will take place to-morrow (Friday) at half-past twelve; and that the Senate will attend the same.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect entertained by the Senate for the memory of CHARLES SUMNER, and his long and distinguished services to his country, that his remains be removed to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and attended by a committee of —— Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives, and invite the House of Representatives to attend the funeral ceremony in the Senate Chamber to-morrow, at half-past twelve o'clock.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the event which the resolutions of the Senate announce fell upon the ear of this House and of the country yesterday with startling suddenness. Wherever the news of it spreads through this broad land, not only in this city, among his associates in the public councils; not only in the old Commonwealth of which he was the pride and ornament, but in many quiet homes, in many a cabin of the poor and lowly, there is to-day inexpressible tenderness and profound sorrow.

There are many of us who have known and loved the great Senator, whom this event unfits for public duties, or for any thoughts other than those of that pure life, that faithful public service, that assured immortality.

In response to the invitation of the Senate I offer these resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House will attend the funeral of CHARLES SUMNER, a Senator from Massachusetts, in the Senate Chamber, to-morrow, at half-past twelve o'clock, and upon its return to this Hall the Speaker shall declare the House adjourned.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, who, with the members of the House from Massachusetts, shall accompany the body of the deceased Senator to its place of burial in that Commonwealth.

Resolved, That, as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

The question being taken on the resolutions, they were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions contemplate the attendance of the members of the House from Massachusetts in another capacity than merely as a committee of the House. The committee called for by the resolutions will be as follows:

Messrs. STEPHEN A. HURLBUT, of Illinois; EUGENE HALE, of Maine; CHARLES FOSTER, of Ohio; JOSEPH H. RAINEY, of South Carolina; CHARLES CLAYTON, of California; HENRY J. SCUDDER, of New York; SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania; JAMES B. BECK, of Kentucky; and JOHN HANCOCK, of Texas.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELL: The petition of citizens of Georgia, for the establishment of a post-route from Clayton to Hiwassee, in the State of Georgia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: The petition of Mary Jane Marston, widow, Elizabeth Jenkins, Henrietta Jenkins, Lydia Ann Williams, widow, and Sarah Jenkins, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, heirs of Nicholas Foquet and Mark Antoine Foquet, to be paid the sum due the estate of said Foquet for services in the revolutionary war, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CLAYTON: Resolutions of the Legislature of California, relative to the survey of the mountain grazing-lands of that State, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. COBB, of Kansas: Resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in relation to unjust discriminations by the Union Pacific Railroad in regard to freights and passengers, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of W. H. Quinn and others, in relation to the eight-hour law, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: The petition of William Armstrong, for a pension, and for an investigation of the action of the Commissioner of Pensions in connection with his case, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of country-produce dealers dealing in the market-houses of Philadelphia, that the Red Bank Ferry Company may have a landing at the foot of Broad street, on League Island, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of Abbie Devine, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of country produce-dealers dealing in the market-houses of Philadelphia, that the Red Bank Ferry Company may have a landing at the foot of Broad street, on League Island, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The petition of W. B. Harlan, of Forest County, Pennsylvania, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STRAWBRIDGE: The petition of 116 citizens of Bloomsburgh, Columbia County, Pennsylvania, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee, in opposition to any increase in internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on foreign imports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, two petitions of citizens of Danville, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

FUNERAL SERVICES OF MR. SUMNER.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.:

O Lord, our God, in the clear face of Thy providence we come together this day to engage in the solemn ceremonies of an occasion which Thou hast made for us as a pause amid the engagements, the excitements, and the tumults of this present life. We beseech Thee—now that we are all assembled in this place, the representatives of the people and the people themselves, to hear the voice of the Lord our God—to look down upon us with Thy favor and blessing, and sanctify to us all the ceremonies and services of this solemn day. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved, showing the appointment by the President pro tempore of the following committees, under the resolutions adopted yesterday:

Committee on arrangements—Messrs. ANTHONY, SCHURZ, FRELINGHUYSEN, MORRILL of Maine, STEVENSON, and THURMAN.

Committee to accompany the remains and act as pall-bearers—Messrs. ANTHONY, SCHURZ, STOCKTON, SARGENT, OGLESBY, and MCCREERY.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, on account of the funeral ceremonies which are to take place in Massachusetts on Monday next, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. EDWARD MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had yesterday passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House will attend the funeral of CHARLES SUMNER, a Senator from Massachusetts, in the Senate Chamber, to-morrow, at half-past twelve o'clock, and upon its return to this Hall the Speaker shall declare the House adjourned.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, who, with the members of the House from Massachusetts, shall accompany the body of the deceased Senator to the place of burial in that Commonwealth.

Resolved, That, as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

At twenty minutes past twelve o'clock the members of the House of Representatives, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by the Speaker and Clerk, entered the Senate Chamber, and were conducted to the seats assigned them.

They were soon followed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the President and his Cabinet ministers.

At half-past twelve o'clock the casket containing the remains of the deceased Senator was brought into the Senate Chamber, preceded by the Chaplains of the two Houses, and the committee on arrangements, and escorted by the pall-bearers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The religious services appropriate to the occasion will now be performed.

Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D., Chaplain to the House of Representatives, read 1 Cor., xv, 22–28, and then offered the following prayer:

Great God, we bow reverently in Thy presence. Thou hast done it. Teach us wisdom as we walk among the open graves. Bless the millions whose hearts gather tenderly around this coffin to-day. Bless our own great land, and give unto us continued victory of truth and righteousness. We ask these mercies in the name and for the sake of Him who hath taught us, when we pray, to say: Our Father, who art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil: For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, read Psalm xxxix, 5–13, and Psalm xc, and offered the following prayer:

Let us pray. Almighty and everlasting God, before Whom the world and all that it contains are as the dust of the balance; before Whom change and time flee away like a shadow; yet art Thou the confidence of all the ends of the earth; for it is in Thee that we live, and move, and have our being; because Thou hast made of one blood all men who dwell on the face of the earth; because Thou hast formed and fashioned us and placed us in our lot. Thou hast appointed the bounds of our habitation, and Thou hast numbered all our days; and it has pleased Thee, O Lord our God, in the fullness of Thine own time, to send among us Thy Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, the Lord God manifest in the flesh, to bring to us the expectation of light and life and of immortality. And so with Him, in the successive centuries, it has pleased Thee to raise up the prophets and apostles, the heroes and princes of the world. It has pleased Thee, in the conflict and turmoil of this our mortal state, to send forth the ministers of Thy grace and providence, endowed and panoplied for their mighty task. And so, in all the crises of the times, when enormous evils had to be encountered, when the old order of things had to be overthrown, when the new conditions for the new energies of the human race had to be created, Thou hast planted Thy workmen at every point, and Thou hast fitted and guarded and upheld them with courage and with strength.

O Lord our God, how marvelous are all Thy works and ways! How marvelous dost Thou still continue this day before us and before all men, as much in removing away Thy servants from their field of labor as in sending them into it when Thou wilt; so that the day of our death is fuller of meaning than the day of our birth, because it is a grander lesson of our manhood, because it is a chapter far advanced in the book of human destiny!

And now Thou hast removed away from us a man who had stood so long as a prince of the earth, a man whose name and life and character and fame are forever linked with all that is sacred in human institutions, and all that is dear to human hearts. O Lord, our God, we are all bereaved together. The Senate, the Congress, the capital, the country, all have been made desolate. And the old Plymouth State, where so long ago the Pilgrims came—she sits to-day in mourning, a mother weeping for her prostrate son; and the white men and black men, and all men of every name and race throughout the world, shall this day be touched with the grief of this sudden stroke of Thy providence. But we can say nothing against it before Thee, O Thou righteous Judge and supreme Ruler of mankind. Yet peradventure Thou wilt vouchsafe Thine ear to hear the prayer of Thy servants now for all those who have been afflicted in this dispensation, for the surviving but scattered members of his own family and kindred, for those who were so near to his person and in his presence through all the phases of his private and public life; for those children of that enduring race for whose advancement his great powers have been so long employed; for all his companions and contemporaries in the high and lofty circles of human civilization, both at home and abroad; for his colleague and fellow-Senators in this Chamber, and for the Representatives, the people, and the authorities of his native State; and for all those in every class and in every condition who this day so sincerely lament his loss. O, grant to all these the grace and the consolation of Thy Spirit. Sanctify to them and to this nation this most impressive instruction of Thy providence.

And now we beseech Thee, O Lord, bless Thy servant the President of the United States, and the members of his Cabinet; bless the governors and Legislatures of the States; and, we beseech Thee, bless the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and all the magistrates in the land. Bless the officers and men of the Army and Navy of the United States. Bless all that are in positions of responsibility, of trust, and of honor among this great people. Bless the teachers and instructors of the nation. Bless those who have the charge of the transmission of intelligence, and the conductors of the public press. And we beseech Thee, O Lord, bless all that are engaged in any walk or pursuit of life, in any department of human labor or enterprise, for the promotion of the race and the comfort of this world. And we beseech Thee, O Lord, bless any that may be under the pains and penalties and burdens of this life, to cheer, to comfort, to strengthen, and to uphold them.

And now, we beseech Thee, give to us, one and all, a sense of true humility and of unfeigned contrition for our sins. Fill us with the spirit of repentance toward Thee and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. Pardon our iniquities, and blot out our transgressions before Thee; and accept us, one and all, as Thy sons and daughters, through Whom alone, and Thy work of atonement and effectual intercession, we shall be saved.

And now, O Lord our God, be graciously pleased to go with those who shall bear away forever from this place the body of our lamented friend. Give them safe conduct in the sad journey; and we beseech Thee, in Thy kind providence, let all the arrangements for his obsequies be fittingly made among that noble but now stricken people who await the arrival of the funeral train by the old Cradle of Liberty.

O God, the God of our fathers, bless this nation and all the nations. Bless us and all men together. And, when we come to die, open Thou for us the portals of eternity, and crown every soul with a pure, a blessed, and a glorious immortality. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The services appointed to be performed by the committee of arrangements having been terminated, the Senate of the United States intrusts the mortal remains of CHARLES SUMNER to its Sergeant-at-Arms and a committee appointed by it, charged with the melancholy duty of conveying them to his home, there to be committed earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, in the soil of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Peace to his ashes!

The casket containing Mr. SUMNER's remains having been removed in charge of the committee of arrangements and pall-bearers, (to be conveyed to the railroad depot and thence to Massachusetts,) and the persons invited to seats in the Senate Chamber having retired,

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting that motion, as it seems to be necessary, the Chair will announce that, to the vacancy on the committee on investigation in this District, made vacant by the Senate excusing Mr. BOUTWELL, chairman, the Chair appoints the Senator from Nevada, Mr. STEWART, as chairman of that committee.

The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 13, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR SUMNER.

Mr. HURLBUT. The committee on arrangements appointed by the House have requested me to indicate the following as the order of movement, on the part of the House, in attending the funeral of the late Senator SUMNER:

The Sergeant-at-Arms and one of the door-keepers, followed by the Speaker of the House and the Clerk; next, the Chaplain of the House, accompanied by the chairman of the House committee; the members of the House committee, two and two, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] leading; and then the members of the House of Representatives.

At twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m., the Speaker and members of the House, accompanied by the officers, in the order indicated by the chairman of the committee on arrangements, proceeded to the Senate Chamber.

When the services in the Senate Chamber were concluded, the House returned to its own Hall; and, (at one o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.,) in pursuance of the order of yesterday, adjourned till twelve o'clock to-morrow, the Speaker announcing that the session of Saturday would be for debate only, Mr. WOODWORTH occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 14, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., (Mr. WOODWORTH in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.) Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that Mr. STEWART had been appointed a member of the joint select committee, on the part of the Senate, to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia, in the place of Mr. BOUTWELL, excused.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets to-day for debate only, and the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States is before the House.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to support the bill now pending before the House. Believing, as I do, that it is clearly within the constitutional authority of Congress to pass this measure, and that it is demanded by the interests of the commerce and the people of the country, I cannot do otherwise than give it my voice and my vote.

The object and purpose of the bill is to secure and enforce the right of the people to carry on their commerce at fair and reasonable rates of transportation. It will not be denied that transportation by the common carrier at fair and reasonable rates is a right of the people. It is a right that has always existed. It has been one of the doctrines of the common law from its earliest days that the common carrier must carry for all persons, and at reasonable rates of compensation. When, therefore, this bill provides, as it does in the second section, that no person, corporation, or company engaged in operating a railroad into or through two or more States shall charge, demand, or receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight or passengers, it simply puts into the form of a statute one of the oldest principles of the common law. It imposes no new obligation upon the railroad companies; it confers no new right or privilege upon the people. The great object of the bill is to provide apt and efficient means for the protection of the existing rights of the people and for the enforcement of the legal duty of the railroad companies. The only regulation of commerce prescribed in the bill is that railroad companies engaged in commerce among the several States shall receive only fair and reasonable rates for the transportation of freight and passengers; a regulation consonant with the natural rights of the public, with the natural duty of the common carrier, and as old and universal as that vast system of law whose growth from the earliest years of English history marks the progress of our jurisprudence and civilization.

At the very threshold of the proposed legislation we are met by the question, has Congress the constitutional authority to pass this bill?

Section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution provides that—

> Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The question, therefore, is this: Under this provision of the Constitution, has Congress the right to prescribe as a regulation of commerce among the several States the rule of the common law, that only fair and reasonable rates shall be charged for the transportation of freight and passengers upon the railroads engaged in such commerce, and to provide necessary and suitable means for the enforcement of that legislation?

It was said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, that—

> Commerce is undoubtedly traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.

By the very words of the Constitution, Congress has the power to regulate commerce among the several States, that is, in the words of Chief Justice Marshall, to "prescribe the rules for carrying on that commerce." It is now proposed to prescribe for the government of this commerce the rule of the common law respecting the rates of charge for transportation, and, judging from the words of the Constitution, the power of Congress to prescribe this rule would seem to be too clear to admit of doubt.

It has not been denied that transportation is a constituent of commerce, and as such comes within the regulating power of Congress. Indeed, it has been settled by repeated judicial decisions that the transportation of freight and passengers is an element, and an essential element, of commerce, and that the power to regulate commerce necessarily includes the power to regulate the transportation of freight and passengers. The word "commerce," as used in the Constitution, includes the transportation of freight and passengers, without which there could be no "commerce among the several States."

Mr. Justice Washington, in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell, thus interprets this provision of the Constitution:

> Commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations and among those States for purposes of trade, be the object of that trade what it may; and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States or by a passage overland through the States, when such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the States. It is this intercourse which Congress is invested with the power of regulating, and with which no State has a right to interfere.

This has been the uniform interpretation of this provision of the Constitution by the courts in numerous decisions; and if the uniform and repeated decisions of the courts can settle anything, then it must be regarded as settled by the only tribunals that can authoritatively interpret the Constitution that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States necessarily includes and comprehends the power to regulate the means by which it is carried on.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that, although Congress has power to regulate commerce among the several States, and although this power is exercised by regulating the means by which that commerce is carried on, yet Congress has no power to pass the pending bill; that Congress has no power to establish so simple and so just a regulation as that no more than a fair and reasonable compensation shall be demanded for the transportation of freight and passengers.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] who, early in the debate, addressed the House upon this subject, labored at great length and with great ability to show that the Constitution falls far short of giving to Congress any power whatever to legislate touching the charges for the transportation of freight and passengers upon railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

The gentleman, indeed, admits that if the extent of the power is to be deduced solely from the words in which it is granted, it would be ample to warrant the proposed legislation. He says:

> The terms used to express the grant are general. Undoubtedly, in a state of isolation, the words are sufficiently sweeping. * * * The words used comprehend every species of commercial intercourse. They are without inherent limitation.

And again the gentleman says:

> If the words of the grant were to be decisive of the extent, &c., of the power, the enigma would be of easy solution, and the friends of the pending bill might rejoice in the absoluteness and universality of the words used.

But the gentleman finds, or thinks he finds, limitations upon this power which not only serve his purpose by placing this bill beyond its limits, but which confine the grant to an exceedingly narrow compass.

He adverts to the depressed and disordered condition of American commerce at the time of and prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the evils resulting to it from the independent, conflicting, and often retaliatory regulations of the different States, and the influence of these facts in the formation and adoption of the Constitution, and concludes——

That the paramount object of the grant to Congress of the power to regulate commerce among the States was to remove from it and to preclude the restrictions and burdens inseparable from rival systems of State legislation, and so to secure the only boon it asked, the charity of being let alone, subject only to such general regulations or rules by act of Congress as would inure to its safety and freedom.

Thus the gentleman deduces the paramount object and purpose of the grant, not from the words in which it was made, not from the Constitution that contains it, but from the condition of the country, and of commerce at the time it was made. As the great evil under which commerce was then suffering, was the burdensome and injurious restrictions and taxes imposed by the States upon the commerce of each other, the gentleman infers that the object of the grant was to enable Congress to remove these restrictions and burdens, and to prevent their imposition in the future, and that the exercise of the power thus granted should be confined to such legislation as might be necessary for that purpose. In substance, the gentleman's argument changes this provision of the Constitution from a grant of power to Congress to a prohibition upon the States. The gentleman strenuously insists that the power is not as broad and comprehensive as the words in which it is granted. But he is unable to find in the Constitution the limitations he wants; hence, he exclaims, the power is limited by its objects. And these objects are the removal and prevention of the restrictions and burdens imposed upon commerce by the States under the Confederation, and to these objects alone he would confine the exercise of the power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I dissent entirely from this construction of this grant of power.

I admit that in construing the powers of Congress, their nature and objects are to be kept constantly in view, and I agree that it is entirely proper to consult the contemporaneous history and condition of the country. But I deny that the nature and objects of the powers of Congress are to be inferred entirely or mainly from contemporaneous history, or that extrinsic facts can be appealed to, to place limitations upon those powers, which are not even remotely suggested by the Constitution itself. I do not agree that the Constitution is to be regarded as a mere prescription of remedies for the evils that afflicted the body-politic at the time of its adoption. The convention that framed it was not a legislature sitting to devise cures for the local and temporary evils of the times. Its functions and duties were of a far higher, nobler, and more comprehensive character. It was engaged in devising a form of government that in time should become the mistress of a continent, and preside over the destinies of unnumbered millions; it was engaged in settling the fundamental principles which should be its strength and its anchor amid all the changing tides of human affairs; it was engaged in clothing it with certain great powers which would enable it "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare," through all the coming years of the future, and when the peculiar conditions, wants, and evils of the times that gave it birth should have passed away forever.

In framing such an instrument and for such a purpose, the convention could not, from the very nature of the case, adapt it to any merely local or transient condition of affairs in the country. It could not and did not legislate for the country, but it laid down the principles and established the rules by which Congress should legislate for the country.

In section 8, of article 1, the convention enumerated certain great, independent, substantive powers which are conferred upon Congress. Among them is the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. In construing these powers, it is important to remember the purpose and character of the instrument in which they are contained. It is a constitution, not a statute; a constitution framed for the vast future and intended to be a perpetual source of power from which Congress could draw remedies and measures of relief suited to the constantly changing conditions and circumstances of human affairs. The Constitution remains the same. The powers granted by it remain the same. But the measures by which these powers are carried into execution will change from time to time to suit the constantly varying needs and wants of the country. It is the purpose of the Constitution to furnish Congress with the power to legislate as the exigencies of the country may require. The power in some respects may remain dormant for many years awaiting an occasion for calling it into exercise, but when the occasion comes, when the necessity arises, it is then the duty of Congress to exercise it.

To limit the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States by the exigencies of commerce at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, is to ignore all growth, all progress and improvement in commerce, and the means by which it is carried on, and to forget, what is patent to us and the country, that that very improvement has engendered a new brood of evils, and of a class entirely different from those that afflicted commerce under the Confederation, but which equally demand for their removal the regulating power of Congress.

The gentleman concedes that the power conferred by the Constitution will enable Congress to prevent the States from imposing burdens upon commerce carried on among the several States. Can he assign any good reason why the same power will not also enable Congress to prevent the railroad companies from imposing unnecessary and oppressive burdens upon commerce by exacting unjust and unreasonable rates for transportation? Is not the latter case as clearly within the terms and the nature of the grant as the former?

Mr. Speaker, I can see no reason whatever in the rule that limits the object of this power of Congress to the removal and prevention of a certain class of evils, simply and only because those evils happened to exist at the time the Constitution was framed and adopted. Why should an appeal be made to extrinsic facts, to exempt from the operation of this grant cases that are as clearly within its terms and purposes as those to which the gentleman concedes its application? Such a rule of construction is, in my judgment, a perversion and violation of the spirit and meaning, no less than of the terms, of the Constitution.

This same argument was most strenuously urged before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sturgis vs. Cowninshield, reported in 4 Wheaton. The case involved the constitutionality of a bankrupt law of the State of New York, and it was contended that the spirit and the object of the grant of power to Congress in the Federal Constitution on the subject of bankruptcy, did not go beyond enabling Congress to correct the evils resulting from certain questionable legislation by the States under the Confederation. In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Marshall disposes of this argument, in his masterly way, by the use of the following language:

Although the spirit of an instrument—especially of a constitution—is to be respected not less than its letter, yet the spirit is to be collected chiefly from its words. It would be dangerous in the extreme to infer from extrinsic circumstances that a case for which the words of an instrument expressly provide, shall be exempted from its operation.

And again, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, in interpreting the power now under consideration, the same great jurist says:

It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe, the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself; may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, many years ago the Supreme Court of the United States—the tribunal of final authority upon all questions of constitutional construction—after full argument and great deliberation, solemnly rejected the rule that the gentleman from Kentucky adopts, and adopted the rule that the gentleman from Kentucky rejects.

As the power to regulate commerce has no limits except such as are found in the Constitution, so the exercise of that power by Congress can only be limited by the Constitution. It is familiar law that although the legislative powers of Congress are limited to certain subjects, yet as to those subjects they are plenary and supreme.

In Sturgis vs. Cowninshield, before referred to, Chief Justice Marshall says:

If any proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this: that the Government of the Union, although limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action.

And again, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, he says:

If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, although limited to certain specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

It follows as an inevitable consequence of these principles that Congress, in the execution of its power to regulate commerce among the several States, can employ such means as its judgment and wisdom shall approve. The Constitution has nowhere prescribed the mode or the means by which this power shall be carried into execution. Congress, having the right and being charged with the duty of regulating commerce, must, from the nature of the case and according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means and to determine what particular regulations are required by the exigencies of commerce and the needs of the country. This power, like all the other powers of Congress, is to be exercised for the public good, and of the means and measures which the public good requires, Congress must be the sole judge.

Let it be remembered that the end sought to be accomplished by the proposed legislation is to prevent the exaction of unjust and extortionate charges for transportation upon railroads engaged in commerce among the States; it is to prevent a great monopoly from taking advantage of the necessities of the people to rob them of the fruits of their labors. Is not the end a legitimate one? Is it not clearly within the scope of the Constitution? Of what use is the power to regulate commerce if it will not authorize Congress to protect that commerce against the greed and injustice of the carrier?

If the object to be accomplished is within the scope of the Constitution, the means are clearly within the discretion of Congress. Congress may always select the means by which it will carry into execution the powers conferred upon it.

Upon this point Chief Justice Marshall says:

But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but which consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

By the Constitution Congress has the power to regulate commerce among the several States. The power is plenary, supreme. It recognizes no limitations not contained in the Constitution. Its length and breadth are to be measured by the words in which it is granted, and these, as the gentleman from Kentucky says, "are without inherent limitation." To the judgment and discretion of Congress are committed the means by which it is to be carried into execution, and made to serve the interests and to promote the welfare of the country.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, such a power is ample to authorize the passage of the pending bill.

But the gentleman from Kentucky insists that, even conceding the power of Congress to pass the bill, the measure is unwise and impolitic. He refers to the remarkable growth of commerce in the country since the days of the Confederation, and says that the "triumphs and logic of the past are against the bill."

I confess my inability to see the point to this argument. Because commerce has succeeded in spite of the disadvantages under which it has labored, shall we account those disadvantages, blessings, and refuse to remove them? Because commerce has grown and spread notwithstanding its fetters, shall we therefore say that it is unwise and impolitic to remove the fetters? Commerce has grown and spread and achieved success notwithstanding the unjust and burdensome exactions of the railroads. But I can see in this fact no reason why these exactions should be allowed to continue. If commerce has been able to prosper under the weight of these exactions, how much greater would be its prosperity when relieved of them. The "triumphs and logic of the past" do not argue against affording relief and protection against the injustice that has injured and hindered, but not crushed, the commerce of the country; but they do show the vigor and energy of our industries and traffic, and they point to still greater triumphs and achievements in the future when commerce shall be relieved of the extortion and greed that are now practiced upon it.

It has been abundantly shown in this debate that the commerce of the country has for many years been subject to unfair and unreasonable rates of charge for transportation.

In so far as these charges have been unfair and unreasonable, they have been an unjust and unnecessary burden and tax upon that commerce—a tax that has amounted to many millions of dollars annually. Is it not for the benefit of the people who bear this burden that it should be removed? Is it not for the benefit of commerce, whose vigor it wastes, whose volume it diminishes, and whose value it impairs, that this oppressive tax should be removed? A great wrong and injustice is being practiced upon the people by which they are annually robbed of much of the fruits of their industry. Congress has the power to remedy that wrong. This bill seeks to supply that remedy. Can we have a stronger incentive to action than is here?

Mr. Speaker, I hope to see this bill become a law. And I hope it is but the first step in a radical and comprehensive system of legislation that shall have for its object the deliverance of the commerce of the country from the greed and power of that vast monopoly that now controls it with an iron hand. Congress was invested with the power to regulate commerce in order that it might foster, protect, and promote that commerce. The time has come when this power must be exercised and this duty discharged. This is a question that vitally affects the material interests, growth, and development of the whole country. The vast and rapidly increasing commerce of the country demands a freer way and a cheaper transportation, and from this demand we cannot turn aside without failing—failing utterly, fatally, ruinously—in our duty.

I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STANARD.]

Mr. STANARD. Mr. Speaker, I feel under obligations to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRATT] for having yielded a portion of his time to me. There appears to be to-day a great pressure for time to speak upon this subject, and I will be as brief as possible. The able arguments that have been made upon this bill for the last two weeks have been directed chiefly to its constitutional and legal bearing. As I am not a member of the legal profession, the few remarks that I expect to make shall be more of a practical than of a legal character.

It is patent to every member of the House that there is a great interest felt in this country on the subject of transportation. Chambers of commerce, from Saint Paul to the Gulf of Mexico, during the past few years, have constantly been passing resolutions asking that the country may have more adequate facilities for transportation, and that they may have cheaper transportation. Scarcely a Legislature in the western country during the past two winters has gone through its session without pleading that Congress should do something to relieve the people. Agriculturists throughout the land are pleading for more and cheaper transportation facilities. Cheap-transportation organizations have been formed, speeches have been made, conventions have been organized throughout the country, showing that the people are in earnest; and of all the matters that will come before this Congress for their consideration and deliberation and action, I do not believe there is one in which there is so great an interest felt as there is in the proposition now before us.

Most of the arguments which have been made have been relative to the power of Congress. I propose, sir, to say something relative to the necessity for Congress doing something in this matter. I also propose to show that railroads and rivers bear a very close relation to each other in their possibilities to afford the greatest amount of transportation facilities to the country, that one should supplement the other. It will hardly be said by those who are at all familiar with the commerce of the Upper Mississippi River that the railroads of that section do not discriminate against it, and so regulate their tariffs as to make it impossible for a large class of producers and shippers to avail themselves of cheaper river transportation, as it is well known that they place such arbitrary rates on consignments to the river as preclude their stopping there, charging as much in a majority of cases for transporting produce from fifty or a hundred miles west of the river to it as they do from points of shipment two hundred miles east of the river, and in some cases more, thereby depriving the people of the cheap and additional facilities the country so much needs and so earnestly demands.

Much has been said in this discussion and on other occasions relative to the growing commerce of the country, and more especially of the West. There are many gentlemen now here whose fathers or they themselves carried the seed-corn and the seed-wheat to the great producing States of the western country, and I desire to show by some figures which I have how the productions have increased during the past two or three decades in the West, and thereby to show that if they have increased so much in the past they will also increase in the future, and that it is the duty of Congress to provide for the future as time passes on.

Sir, in 1840 the so-called cereal-producing States of the Northwest produced 166,304,000 bushels of grain; in 1850 the increase was nearly double, or 311,580,000 bushels; in 1860 the increase was to 577,255,000 bushels, and in 1870 to 812,155,500 bushels. I desire to show the increase in production in some of the comparatively new States, in what is now the great central cereal-producing region of this country. In 1850 Illinois produced 77,527,000 bushels of grain; in 1860, 156,543,000 bushels; in 1870, 208,036,000 bushels. Wisconsin in 1850 produced 10,060,000 bushels; in 1860, 35,868,000 bushels; in 1870, 64,199,500 bushels. Minnesota produced nothing in 1850; in 1860, 7,564,000 bushels; in 1870, 35,450,000 bushels. Iowa in 1850 produced 11,809,000 bushels of cereals; in 1860, 57,613,000 bushels; in 1870, 121,951,900 bushels. Missouri in 1850 produced 44,557,000 bushels; in 1860, 81,504,000 bushels; in 1870, 97,793,000. Kansas in 1860 produced 6,483,000; in 1870, 23,725,000 bushels. Nebraska produced in 1870 8,372 bushels; there are no statistics for 1850 and 1860; no production.

Now, there are some gentlemen who seem to think that our western country is pretty well filled up and about finished, and no provision necessary for the future. I have some figures here to show the whole number of acres of land in each of these six States, the number of acres that are in cultivation, the number that are not cultivated, and the percentage of that cultivated to the amount of the entire area of these six cereal-producing States. In Illinois there are 35,459,200 acres of land, 19,329,952 of which are cultivated, it being only 55 per cent. of the entire area of that State. The area of Wisconsin is 34,511,360 acres, of which 5,899,343 are cultivated, or 17 per cent. of the area of that State. Minnesota has 53,459,840 acres; under cultivation, 2,322,102, or only 4 per cent. of the entire area. Iowa has 35,228,800 acres; under cultivation, 9,396,467, or 26 per cent. Missouri has 41,824,000; under cultivation, 9,130,615, or 22 per cent. Kansas has 50,187,520; under cultivation, 1,971,003, or 4 per cent. Nebraska has 78,084,480; under cultivation, 647,031, or less than 1 per cent. of its entire area. Take these six great cereal-producing States, and but 18 per cent. of their entire land is under cultivation. And to show that these States are rapidly overtaking the East in their manufactures, I produce the following:

Table showing the value of manufactures in the following States in 1860 and in 1870, with the percentage of increase in the latter over the former year.

States.	Value of manufactures in 1860.	Value of manufactures in 1870.	Increase, per cent.
Illinois	$57, 580, 886	$205, 620, 672	257
Wisconsin	27, 849, 467	77, 214, 326	177
Minnesota	3, 373, 172	23, 110, 700	585
Iowa	13, 971, 325	46, 534, 322	233
Missouri	41, 782, 731	206, 213, 429	393
Kansas	4, 357, 408	11, 775, 833	170
Nebraska	607, 328	5, 738, 512	845
Total	149, 522, 317	576, 207, 794	285

New Hampshire	37, 586, 453	71, 038, 249	89
Vermont	14, 637, 807	32, 184, 606	119
Massachusetts	255, 545, 922	553, 912, 568	116
Rhode Island	40, 711, 206	111, 418, 354	173
Connecticut	81, 924, 555	161, 065, 474	96
Total	468, 599, 287	1, 009, 116, 772	115

Last May, in the course of my remarks before an assemblage of Congressmen in Saint Louis, I said:

The future demands for increased transportation facilities will be in the Mississippi Valley. The census returns of the last decade show that the principal increase in population is in the Western States. The increase of population in the six New England States was 352,641, or 11½ per cent.; the increase in the six Western States of Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Wisconsin, and Minnesota was 2,669,995, or 58.2 per cent. In agricultural productions almost the entire increase occurred on the broad and fertile valleys of the great West, while the percentage of increase in manufactured goods is largely in favor of the Western States. For example, the increase of manufactured products in Massachusetts was 200 per cent., while the increase in Iowa was over 300 per cent. New York swelled the volume of her manufactures to a little more than 200 per cent., while Illinois rose in her percentage to within a fraction of 400 per cent. Pennsylvania, the grand old Keystone State, celebrated for her manufactures, struggled up to 250 per cent. advance in her manufacturing interests, while Missouri, disenthralled and under the inspiration of her new life, marks the score of her advance at 500 per cent.

And these remarks may not be inappropriate on this occasion, although I would not refer in this connection to any of the Eastern States except to show the rapid growth of the West, and in no way to disparage the East.

The time has come when there is a necessity for some action relative to increased transportation facilities. It is claimed, and truthfully, by the producers of the great Northwest that the railroads have discriminated against the rivers, and that in some instances freight rates are almost equivalent to confiscation.

It is also shown by figures within the reach of every Congressman that more than one-half of the cereal productions of this country are from west of the Mississippi River; that the line of Quincy, Davenport, and Dubuque is to-day about the center of the cereal-producing regions of this country. In 1856 that central line was along the Wabash River. I doubt not, judging from the past, that by 1885 the center of the cereal-producing region will be on the line of Kansas City, Saint Joseph, and Omaha; and I imagine that the people will insist that they shall have all the benefits that can come to them by a free and advantageous use of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and that railroads will not much longer have the power to unjustly discriminate against them.

I desire in this connection to give some figures relative to water transportation on the Mississippi River. And as like figures have been paraded before the public for many years in a statistical shape, I concluded I would bring them in a different form before the House of Representatives. A little more than two weeks ago, expecting this subject would come up for consideration, and that I might have an opportunity to speak upon it, I telegraphed to some gentlemen I knew in the Mississippi Valley and East, asking for rates of freight, &c. The first dispatch I sent was as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1874.

J. M. MASON,
Superintendent Northern Line Packet Company, Saint Louis, Missouri:

Telegraph me your usual rates freight on grain at an average stage of water in spring and summer from Upper Mississippi River to Saint Louis.

E. O. STANARD.

To this I received the following answer:

SAINT LOUIS, February 23, 1874.

E. O. STANARD, Washington:

Average rate on grain to Saint Louis is 15 cents per one hundred pounds from Davenport, and 20 cents per one hundred from points above Davenport to Saint Louis.

J. M. MASON, Agent.

This would give from Davenport and points on the Upper Mississippi below Davenport to Saint Louis 9 cents per bushel, and to points between Davenport and Saint Paul 12 cents per bushel to Saint Louis.

On the same day I sent the following:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1874.

HENRY C. HAARSTICK,
Superintendent Mississippi Valley Transportation Company, Saint Louis:

Telegraph me your present rates of freight on grain by the bushel or hundred pounds from Saint Louis to New Orleans.

E. O. STANARD.

To this I received the following reply:

SAINT LOUIS, February 23, 1874.

Hon. E. O. STANARD, Member of Congress, Washington:

In large lots our rates are 8 cents per bushel for bulk corn, and 15 cents per hundred for rolling freight from Saint Louis to New Orleans.

HENRY C. HAARSTICK,
Vice-President and General Superintendent.

On the same day I sent the following dispatch:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1874.

CHARLES E. SLAYBACK & CO.,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Telegraph the price at which you can contract shipments of grain from New Orleans to Liverpool and to New York.

E. O. STANARD.

To this I received the following reply:

NEW ORLEANS, February 24, 1874.

Hon. E. O. STANARD:

We can contract freight on grain shipments Liverpool 13 to 14 per cent. sail and steam; to New York 13 to 14 cents per bushel steam.

CHARLES E. SLAYBACK & CO.

That we might institute a comparison between railroad rates and river rates I telegraphed as follows to Saint Paul:

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1874.

PRESIDENT BOARD TRADE,
Saint Paul, Minnesota:

Telegraph at my expense rate of freight by rail on grain from Saint Paul to New York.

E. O. STANARD.

To this I received the following answer:

SAINT PAUL, MINNESOTA, February 25, 1874.

E. O. STANARD:

Freight on wheat from Saint Paul to New York 50 cents bushel; no other grain shipped.

W. R. DELANO,
President Board Trade.

On the 24th of February I telegraphed to the mayor of Davenport as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1874.

MAYOR OF DAVENPORT, Iowa:

Telegraph at my expense rate of freight on grain, by rail, from Davenport to New York.

E. O. STANARD.

I received on the same day the following answer:

DAVENPORT, IOWA, February 25, 1874.

E. O. STANARD:

The printed rate of freight on grain by rail from Davenport to New York is 60 cents per hundred. Will have no difficulty in getting 5 cents off.

J. H. MURPHY, Mayor.

On the same day I telegraphed as follows to New York, to ascertain the rates of freight from New York to Liverpool:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1874.

L. ROBERTS, New York:

What is the present rate of freight on wheat and corn, per bushel, from New York to Liverpool? Answer.

E. O. STANARD.

I received the following answer:

NEW YORK, February 24.

E. O. STANARD, Washington:

Grain freights to Europe firm. Sail ten pence; steam ten and a half pence.

L. ROBERTS & CO.

I see that my time is rapidly passing away, and I therefore omit some remarks that I intended to make in explanation of these figures. I will merely give the results of the figures and the conclusions to which these telegrams force me. I have prepared, from these dispatches, a summary of the relative rates by rail and by water transportation from the points referred to.

From Saint Paul to New York, according to these dispatches, the rate by rail is 50 cents per bushel; from Saint Paul to New York, by river and ocean, it is 33 cents—a saving of 17 cents from Saint Paul to New York by way of New Orleans.

From Davenport to New York by rail the charge is 36 cents; by river and ocean 30 cents—a saving of 6 cents on water transportation by way of New Orleans.

From Saint Paul to Liverpool the rate by rail and ocean, according to these telegrams, is 71 cents; and by river and ocean 48 cents—showing a saving of 23 cents by way of New Orleans.

From Davenport to Liverpool, by way of New York, the rate is 56 cents by rail and ocean; from Davenport to Liverpool, by way of New Orleans, the charge is 45 cents—a saving of 11 cents by the river.

From Saint Louis to New York the rate by rail, at the date of these dispatches, was 36 cents a bushel, by river 22 cents—a saving of 14 cents a bushel by river.

From Saint Louis to Liverpool the rate by rail and ocean, according to these dispatches, is 56 cents per bushel, by river 36 cents—a saving of 20 cents per bushel by way of the river.

Taking the whole average of these figures, from various shipping points from Saint Paul to Saint Louis, they show a saving in shipping to New York by the way of New Orleans of 12 cents per bushel; and shipping to Liverpool by the way of New Orleans, from shipping points on the Mississippi River, there is shown an average saving of 19 cents per bushel. And these figures show, counting the production per acre of ground at fifty bushels of corn, a saving of six dollars per acre, and on shipments to Liverpool, on the average production of fifty bushels to the acre, eight and a half or nine dollars.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STANARD. I hope my time will be extended ten minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. STANARD. Mr. Speaker, these are some of the benefits that the people of the West are anxious to realize. And, sir, I have been informed that it has been shown before one of your committees that, by having proper facilities for building iron boats located upon the waters of the West, steamers can be produced of light draught, which will carry on each trip 97,300 bushels of wheat or corn at a price not exceeding 3 cents per bushel from Saint Louis to New Orleans on a draught of eight and a half feet; but if the draught is lessened to six feet, they can carry only 59,800 bushels, a difference of 63 per cent. added to the cost of transportation. And here is a strong argument in favor of the Government hastening the improvement of the channel of the river between Saint Louis and Cairo, so that eight to ten feet of water may always be had during seasons of low water between these two points. Iron boats and barges can nowhere be built cheaper than on the banks of the Mississippi River, as iron is there in inexhaustible quantities; and already there is a demand for them on all our western waters in place of wooden ones, and it is hoped and believed that it will not be long before they will be almost in universal use.

In the arguments that have been adduced to show the benefits of the cheapest and most adequate transportation facilities, the burden has been to show the benefits to the West.

Turning to the Atlantic States. Are they not equally interested? Why, sir, New York requires 45,000,000 bushels of corn more than she produces. She is short 7,000,000 bushels of wheat and 778,010,359 pounds of meat. These, with other articles, swell her short supplies to the weight of 1,278,313 tons, upon which she loses, when compared with what she might save by the facilities of these iron vessels and improvements of the Mississippi, $9,881,359 annually. Pennsylvania, in like manner, upon her short supplies, will save $6,578,555; Maryland, $1,712,489; and old Virginia, the mother of many States, would save annually $1,612,293.

Turn from these to the manufacturing States. Take Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, as illustrating the whole. On the short supplies of these States Massachusetts would save $4,419,341, Maine $1,942,224, and Rhode Island $618,523—this last being equal to a tax, if not saved, of $2.85 upon each man, woman, and child in that otherwise prosperous State. By this it is seen that we are mutually dependent upon each other; the States of the West upon those of the East for imports, manufactures, and other industrial products; those of the East upon the West for food supplies; and whatever reduces their cost, reduces also the cost of manufactures, and enables our country to compete successfully in the markets of the world with our agricultural supplies, and with goods made by human ingenuity, sustained and encouraged by these cheapening articles of food. It follows that every State in the Union is deeply interested in these improvements and facilities.

Mr. Speaker, the great Creator, who dug out the ocean and piled the mountains high in air, has spread out the most beautiful and extensive valley through the center of our country that there is on the face of the earth. It now has a population of nearly twenty million souls. It comprises nine hundred and sixty-five million acres of land. Its richness and variety of soil and climate render it more productive than any other part of the globe; the forests of which are hardly touched, and its mines scarcely opened, and less than 20 per cent. of its land cultivated; and will, I believe, before our children are old men and women, have a population of one hundred million people. And the same beneficent Providence has provided this valley with more than twelve thousand miles of navigable rivers, to be as free to the people as the air they breathe, and as universal in blessings as the sunlight.

So much has been said about the capabilities of the Mississippi River to solve the transportation problem, that I will venture an attempt at a short description of it.

From the Balize to Memphis, Tennessee, a distance of about eight hundred miles, there is nearly the whole year water enough to float the largest ships on the ocean, except at the bar at the mouth, where much of the time there is not more than eighteen feet; and I trust the Government will speedily so improve it that the largest vessels can come in without hinderance. And then from Memphis to Cairo, Illinois, a distance of one thousand miles from the mouth of the river, there is an abundance of water the year round for the largest steamers that float on our western waters; and for all this one thousand miles of deep-water navigation it is not necessary for the Government to spend a dollar, to keep it in good navigable condition after leaving the mouth. On the next two hundred miles, from Cairo to Saint Louis, there is sufficient water for more than half the year for any of our boats to run, while on the other half the water is liable to shoal at some six or eight places, so that the larger class of vessels cannot run with much certainty; but these difficulties can be overcome by a moderate expenditure by the Government. And now, sir, we are within one hundred miles of the center of the population of the country, and about half the distance up the valley; and from Saint Louis to Saint Paul, about one thousand miles, there is a sufficient depth of water for boats of ample capacity to accommodate the trade, except in the Des Moines Rapids, at Keokuk, and at the Rock Island Rapids, where the work is so nearly completed, that it is hoped Congress will make sufficient appropriations at this session to complete the works, and make the entire Upper Mississippi in good navigable condition.

I have thus given you a brief outline of the present condition of the Mississippi River; and, sir, is there any such inland navigation in the world? And is it strange that the people are anxious to receive the full fruition of all its possibilities, and anxious that railroads shall not so discriminate against it that they cannot receive all the benefits that should come to them, especially when the country is so much in need of additional transportation facilities? I hope at some other time to have an opportunity of speaking to the House at greater length about the necessity of immediate improvement of the mouth of the river as well as of other points, also of improving some of its tributaries. No Government double-track railroad can give such relief to the people as the Mississippi River. But somebody says it runs the wrong way. Why should it not have the fostering care of the Government running South as well as if it run East? Sir, let Congress give half as much care to the plow-holders' rivers as it has to the bondholders' railroads, and we will have transportation facilities enough; and then the visions of grangers, that appear to be disturbing the dreams of some of our friends and cause them to cry "hay-seed" whenever the subject of cheap transportation is mentioned, may pass away.

But, sir, it is said that the farmers, as a class, are organizing themselves into granges, and demanding cheaper and more transportation. Be it so. They are about 53 per cent. of the population of the country, and certainly have a right to be heard and heeded; and I believe, if this Congress does not comply with their reasonable demands, that others ought to be sent to fill their places who will.

Mr. Speaker, I have already occupied the time of the House longer than I expected; and, thanking the House for their indulgence, I will now give way to others.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent, for one half hour, to complete a speech which I commenced on Wednesday last—not on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House hears the request made by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.] Is there objection?

Mr. EDEN. I understood that this day was set apart for the consideration of the particular question of transportation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands; and if objection is made the request of the gentleman from Connecticut cannot be entertained.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am aware that it is only by the unanimous courtesy of the House that I can obtain the floor for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. EDEN. I do not object the gentleman's proceeding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the gentleman from Connecticut will be allowed to speak on the subject he has indicated, for one half hour.

There was no objection.

[Mr. KELLOGG then concluded the speech commenced on Wednesday last. The speech in full will appear in the Appendix.]

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals for the regulation of "commerce among the several States" cannot but be regarded as one of vast importance in view of the present aspect of the subject with which it deals.

There is perhaps no question before the public which is challenging such an amount of earnest and searching inquiry as the question how to secure the cheapest and best methods of transportation.

The people of the West, and especially the producing classes, are profoundly exercised upon the subject, because they feel more sensibly than others the burdens to be removed. And yet the evils complained of cannot be limited to any class or any section. They are both local and national. They embrace alike producer and consumer, and reach to every interest and every industry throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Nor is the deep and anxious interest in this subject fortuitous or strange. We have a country of vast extent, whose frontier is being pushed year by year farther into the distant Territories as the tide of emigration sweeps onward toward the Pacific coast. The great producing States lie from six to fifteen hundred miles distant from the sea-board. Between these States and the marts of the sea-board commercial relations of the most extensive and intimate character must in the very nature of things always be maintained. Interdependence between these distant sections is a necessity. Not only so; it is likely to increase in magnitude in the years to come.

It is therefore no matter of surprise that the subject, once having gained the attention of the people, should have leaped with a single bound into the very foreground of our politics.

It is not my purpose in discussing the subject to deal very extensively with statistics. These have been so often presented and considered of late that the importance of the subject is thoroughly understood and appreciated. And besides, sir, place your figures and calculations where you may, you will find the facts quickly overreaching the boundaries you prescribe in the onward march of the nation's development.

It is the peculiarity of our marvelous history that it has outrun all human prognostications. Its grand march has been the wonder of the world, and is likely to so continue for generations to come.

From a paper on my table I take the following items for the purpose of bringing to the immediate attention of the House the few significant facts therein contained:

The total products of cereals, (consisting of wheat, Indian corn, oats, rye, buckwheat, and barley,) in all the States and Territories of the United States, amounted—

	Bushels.
In the year 1840, to	615, 535, 077
In the year 1850, to	867, 454, 032
In the year 1860, to	1, 238, 138. 947
In the year 1870, to	1, 357, 230, 096

The aggregate cereal product of all the nations of Europe in 1868, with a total population of 296,128,293, was reported to the international statistical congress at the Hague, in 1869, to be 4,754,516,604 bushels, being 16 bushels to the head. The product in the United States, in 1870, of 1,357,230,096 bushels, with a population of 38,558,371, was 35 bushels to the head.

That the cereal products of the interior States, north of the Ohio River, embracing the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, were—

	Bushels.
In the year 1840	166, 204, 201
In the year 1850	311, 581, 066
In the year 1860	577, 255, 715
In the year 1870	812, 055, 564

Estimating these cereals at 60 pounds avoirdupois per bushel for wheat, 56 for Indian corn, and 32 for oats, with the customary rates for the minor grains, (rye, buckwheat, and barley,) the total weight of the 812,055,364 bushels was 42,302,282,904 pounds, or, in round numbers, 21,000,000 tons of 2,000 pounds, slightly exceeding 40 bushels to the ton. If 11,000,000 tons were reserved (which is an extravagant allowance) to feed the population and animals of the interior States, there would remain for other purposes 10,000,000 tons, nearly all of which, with adequate facilities for cheap and rapid transportation, would be exported to other States, or sent down to the sea-board for export to foreign countries, to feed their constantly increasing populations and animals.

The 10,000,000 tons, if ground into flour or meal, and placed in barrels holding 5 bushels each, would require 80,000,000 barrels, and would fill 40,000 Erie Canal boats, each carrying 250 tons, or 1,000,000 railway freight cars, each carrying 10 tons.

In addition to this, a considerable portion of the 11,000,000 tons reserved to feed the population and animals of the interior would reappear, diminished in weight, but much increased in relative value, in beef, pork, dairy products, and other animal food greatly needed on both sides of the Atlantic, and serving to swell the rich centrifugal streams of our inland commerce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the practical question to be considered is one of means. It is simply what measures within the Constitution ought to be employed to accomplish the end we have in view—cheap and reliable transportation.

I cannot hope, in the time allotted me, to go into a thorough and adequate consideration of this question in all its phases. I can only outline in a general way the policy which, in my judgment, ought to guide us in dealing with it from the national stand-point, leaving its local bearings to the States, where they properly belong.

The first question which confronts us just here is one of the constitutional power of the Government in the premises. This question lies at the root of the discussion, and its consideration is rendered necessary because of the adverse opinions held on the other side of this Chamber—opinions which were declared in the Forty-second Congress, and have been already reaffirmed in the Forty-third.

This power is claimed under an express grant in the Federal Constitution, as follows:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

What is commerce? The narrowest definition of the term—its primitive signification—relates to the interchange of commodities from hand to hand; but in the progress of society, in the broader application of the principles of trade and traffic, it has come to have a more liberal application. In other words, that which is commerce when the implement of transfer is the hand of the parties, is no less commerce when the implement of transfer is the steamboat or the rail-car. The agent is changed, but the thing is the same.

Said Mr. Webster, in defining this subject, in his happy and forcible manner:

We inhabit a various earth; we have reciprocal wants, and reciprocal means for gratifying one another's wants. This is the true origin of commerce, which is nothing more than an exchange of equivalents, and from the rude barter of its primitive state to the refined and complex condition in which we see it, its principle is uniformly the same.

It is commerce, sir, thus defined, over which the power of regulation is granted to Congress—commerce with foreign nations, and commerce among the several States.

Those who have investigated the reasons which led to the abrogation of the old Articles of Confederation and the adoption of the present Constitution need not be told that one of the most potential was the experienced necessity of placing this power of regulation in the national Government.

The distinguished statesman and jurist from whom I have just quoted, in his celebrated argument in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, which was indorsed by the Supreme Court, uses this language:

Few things are better known than the immediate causes which led to the adoption of the present Constitution; and there is nothing, as I think, clearer than that the prevailing motive was to regulate commerce; to rescue it from the embarrassing and destructive consequences resulting from the legislation of so many different States, and to place it under the protection of a uniform law. The great objects were commerce and revenue, and they were objects indissolubly connected. By the Confederation divers restrictions had been imposed on the States, but these had not been found sufficient. No State, it is true, could send or receive an embassy, nor make any treaty, nor enter into a compact with another State or with a foreign power, nor lay duties interfering with treaties which had been entered into by Congress. But all these were found to be far short of what the actual condition of the country required. The States could still, each for itself, regulate commerce, and the consequence was a perpetual jarring and hostility of commercial regulation.

These views, sir, are thoroughly fortified by the history of that period, as any one can ascertain by investigation.

Now, sir, observe again the language which was incorporated into the organic law under the pressure of an imperative public sentiment, born of a disastrous experience under the Confederation:

The Congress——

The very circumstances under which this provision was enacted render the words emphatic.

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The language is clear, forcible, comprehensive. It is an unlimited grant. It is obviously intended for the very object which appears on the face of the provision. Not only so, but in the same section which confers this power and others it is declared, at the end of the section:

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.

Now, sir, if it was necessary in the early history of the Government, when settlements were limited to a narrow belt of country on the Atlantic coast, to lodge the power to regulate "commerce among the States" in the national Government, what shall be said now, in the light of the overpowering necessities which enforce the argument—now, when the commerce of mighty States, then only mighty possibilities, whiten your great inland waters, and thunder along night and day over six competing lines of railway to the sea?

But it is objected that commerce by railway could not have been contemplated when the Constitution was framed, and is therefore not within its terms. But, sir, commerce by steam-vessels stands in the same condition, and yet it has been subject to the most plenary regulations by the Federal authority from the first employment of steamboats, and no one has challenged the power. Besides, sir, the grant of power is not limited to any mode, nor does it apply more to water than to land. It is a power to deal with commerce, no matter how or by what agency it is carried on; otherwise corporations or individuals by simply changing the agencies or means of commerce might place themselves in a situation to defy control.

If to send a thousand barrels of flour from Chicago to New York in exchange for its value in merchandise is commerce when the implement is a steamboat, not less is it commerce when the implement is a rail-car, and in either case it is that identical thing which Congress has been clothed with full power to regulate.

But it is objected again that railways are chartered by, and constructed under, State authority, and therefore exempt from the constitutional provision already quoted. Why exempt? On what principle? Where does the State get the power to authorize individuals or corporations to violate or set aside a plain provision of the Federal Constitution?

I grant that railways chartered by the States are exclusively under State regulation so long as they confine their operations within State limits, and as to all business transacted within such limits; but I deny that when these railways make combinations, so as to constitute through lines, and enter into competition with other agencies for the carrying on of commerce among the States, that they alone of all these agencies are exempt from Federal regulation. I cannot consent to bolster up these great monopolies with any such absurd partiality. If Congress has the power to regulate commerce among the States by steamboats, and sail-vessels, and stage-lines, railroads engaged in the same business, in competition with them, must be subject to the same control.

If railways see fit to limit themselves to local business they are clearly exempt from national regulation. But if they undertake to engage in "through business," outside of and beyond State lines, they become thereby, and to that extent, subject to the legal conditions on which alone such business may be conducted. Nor will they be allowed to plead their charters in violating the law.

These great thoroughfares which are known as "through lines," though composed of subdivisions severally chartered by States, are, for all practical purposes, as to commerce among the States, as thoroughly a unit as if established by a single act of national authority. They make contracts for carrying commodities and passengers from the sea-board to the remotest points of the interior, and vice versa. They employ the same cars for the transportation of such freight and passengers between these remote points without change. They are operated for all the purposes of through traffic under one central authority. Where is the logic which exempts them from regulation because of their charters, so long as they choose to engage in a business which is expressly subject to national regulation? As well might it have been claimed that the various regiments of the Union Armies in the recent war—many of them at least—were not subject to regulation by national authority, when they had passed beyond the limit of State jurisdiction, and become consolidated into the Federal Army because enlisted and organized under State authority. The logic in one case is quite equal to the logic in the other. It would be a strange anomaly if the foremost agencies for carrying on interstate commerce in this nation could defy control, because made up of distinct constituents, which latter were chartered by State authority.

It should be remembered, moreover, that many of the through lines are practically owned and operated by a single company. The Pennsylvania Central, for instance, has effected long leases—ninety-nine year leases—of the several branches of road extending into the Mississippi Valley; and the same are as effectually a part of that great route as if chartered in conjunction with it. If State charters can defeat the terms of the Federal Constitution, what is to hinder parties from constructing railways under such charters for the very purpose of turning them over, under the cover of long leases, to one central organization? If such a plan necessarily exempts their business from Federal regulation they are vastly better off than they could be under a national charter. Under the latter they would be subject to regulation; under the former it is claimed they are wholly exempt except in so far as the States may exert the power of regulation.

Again, sir, a large share of the through business is carried on by special organizations, embracing certain agents or officers of the several distinct companies constituting a ring, who make contracts with themselves for the use of their roads and rolling stock, and thereupon run what are known as fast freight-lines, absorbing all the paying business and exacting extra compensation for the greater speed of transportation, thus securing large dividends at the expense of the honest stockholder.

These sub-organizations, it will be seen, are not operating under or subject to State charters, but are really only private parties who lease certain roads and rolling stock for the purpose of engaging in interstate commerce, and nothing else; who have nothing to do with local business. The States cannot regulate their business, because it is wholly a through business.

Now, sir, will it be claimed that this class of business is not within congressional regulation, and entirely exempt from all control? Such is the logic of the opposition.

But speculation is unnecessary, because the doctrine announced has been established by the highest judicial authority and must be recognized as settled law.

In the Clinton Bridge case, Mr. Justice Miller of the Supreme Court of the United States, in discussing this question, says:

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land it is commerce as well as when carried on by water.

After referring to the fact that steamboats have come into use since the Federal Constitution was adopted, and yet are held to be within the terms of that instrument, he says:

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted—a means by which merchandise is transported across States and kingdoms in the same vehicles in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has with great benefit been the subject of salutary congressional legislation, because it is an instrument of commerce. Is there any reason why the other should not? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that where these roads become parts of great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States; and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government. * * * For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

In a recent case, when the constitutionality of a State law attempting to levy a tax on freight transported beyond State limits, or brought from another State, was under consideration, Mr. Justice Strong, of the same court, said:

Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or water. In either case, the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce.

If commerce, then subject to regulation; if "commerce among the States," then subject to regulation by Congress.

The illustrious Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, enunciates the same doctrine:

It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself; may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case, and which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

The elementary writers hold the same views.

Judge Redfield, in his recent very able work, refers to this clause of the Federal Constitution, in discussing the power of Congress to regulate "commerce among the States" by means of railways, in the following language:

The meaning of the word "commerce" at the time the Constitution was adopted must have been definitely settled and well enough understood. The word, as well understood, is derived from the Latin commercium, and which is found almost in its original form in most of the languages of modern Europe. It means, in its most literal sense, intercourse and exchange both of persons and commodities. It is more nearly synonymous with "traffic" than with any other word in the language, probably. Its great natural divisions for ages have been "foreign" and "inland." The regulation of all the former and that portion of the latter which extended beyond the limits of a single State was, as we have seen, by the organic law of our national Government secured to the nation, and the remainder was naturally left to the particular State where it exclusively existed.

It is obvious that the purpose of the provision was not to be confined to future commerce carried on in the same mode it then was, i. e., by ship and boat navigation, propelled exclusively by wind. If that had been so, the provision could not have been applied to that large portion of commerce now carried on by steam-power, which has already become very considerable, and is constantly increasing in a rapidly advancing ratio. * * * * * *

The fact that the entire subject of regulating all commerce among the different States, including all the means and appliances by which it was carried on, was committed to Congress, and that thereafter the States were to have no concurrent action in the regulation of the same, would seem to reduce the question of Congress having the power of regulating interstate railway traffic to the single inquiry whether it forms any portion of the commerce of the country which requires to be regulated at all. Those who assume to argue that Congress has no power to regulate the traffic upon these extended lines of railways, reaching from one end of the Union to the other, must, if they would meet the question fairly, either say the traffic on these extended lines of railway, amounting to many millions annually, probably ten times as much as the entire commerce of the country at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, is not commerce at all, or, if it be, is not subject to any regulation or control whatever. For it is certain the States have neither the power nor capacity to regulate to any purpose, or with any efficiency, this interstate railway traffic. It must, then, come under the control of Congress, or be left to its own devices and impulses—an experiment never yet tried in any other country.—Redfield on Railways, pages 720–722.

Justice Story in his learned work on the Constitution, says in speaking of the same subject:

This power the Constitution extends to commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

In regard to foreign nations, it is universally admitted that the words comprehended every species of commercial intercourse. No sort of trade or intercourse can be carried on between this country and another to which it does not extend.

Commerce, as used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term. If this be its admitted meaning in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence.

Time forbids a further citation of authorities on this point. The decisions are uniform, consistent, and decisive. They establish the power of Congress under the clause of the Constitution alluded to, and I believe I am correct in asserting that these views are not controverted by any judicial authority whatever.

I should, perhaps, before passing, call attention to the further fact, that the Federal Constitution prohibits any State from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the immunities of citizens of the United States. One of the immunities of the citizens of the United States is the right to invoke the powers conferred upon the national Government, when needed, for the protection of their rights as such citizens. This they cannot do if a State can create a power within itself to trample upon those rights, and at the same time and by the very same act paralyze the power of the Federal Government to afford relief.

I will only add further, under this head, that the denial of this power to the national Government is a fatal surrender of the sovereignty of the people on this important subject; and it is a surrender which leaves not the States, but the railway power of the country the master of the situation.

Not only is it impracticable to secure co-operation in providing and enforcing remedies, but equally impracticable to secure uniformity of legislation among the different States. Their interests are by no means the same. The States lying near the sea-board can have no interest in a reduction of the rates on through business, which can only operate to require an advance in local rates in order to secure desired dividends. Or, again, any State lying along the great through routes of travel and traffic may be under influences friendly to their own roads, or may, for a liberal percentage of receipts, aid in exacting unreasonable and excessive rates for through business.

All supervision and power of regulation on the part of Congress denied, pray tell me, sir, what is to hinder any State from levying tribute in the manner indicated upon through freights and enforcing conditions of transit upon the people of the interior sending their products by railway to the sea-board? The people of the interior States cannot assent for one moment to such doctrine, even to accommodate those who insist that there are no rights in this Government but State rights, and no sovereignty but State sovereignty. To suppose otherwise is to suppose them stricken with judicial blindness.

I yield to no one in homage to the doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty, properly defined and rightly understood. I insist upon the absolute right of the States to regulate their own affairs in their own way, but I deny their right to regulate the affairs of the nation in their own way; I deny their right or power to nullify the provisions of the Federal Constitution, provided for the benefit of the whole people, by direction or indirection.

In my judgment nothing could be more mischievous and indefensible than that false and perverted theory of State rights which constantly shuts out and cries down the just rights and powers of the national Government, and forever thrusts those of the State before them.

There is no conflict between these two sovereignties, and ought to be none; they are but parts of one harmonious system; and, sir, if there is any school of political ethics which deserves the anathemas of all right-thinking men, it is that school which teaches an opposite doctrine; which insists that the State alone is sovereign and commands an allegiance before and above the allegiance due the national Government; which insinuates that one is less the people's government than the other; which seeks to draw from the homage due to one in order to bolster up the preferred claims of the other.

This false theory of State rights has been the demon of our history as a people. It has flung its blight at different periods across our pathway, until finally, in an evil hour, it sought with desperate effort and with bloody hands to strangle the Republic and sacrifice the liberties of a great people. And yet, notwithstanding the terrible lessons of experience from which we have but just emerged, there are those among us who seem to nurse a strange abhorrence of Federal sovereignty, and look upon it as a foreign and hostile thing, in which they have no part nor lot, instead of regarding it as it is, in fact, the expression of the power and the beneficence of the grandest and freest government on the face of the earth.

I remember to have somewhere read that in the Middle Ages a solemn council of state was actually broken up in Europe because of an owl that chanced to perch on one of the rafters overhead and refused to be dislodged or driven out. It is true he made no hostile demonstration; it is true he seemed as harmless as the august magnates on whom he solemnly looked down. But there he sat, and who could presume to say what mysterious power he might evoke or what dread evil his presence might imply? The apprehension was too powerful for the council; they broke and fled before it. And, sir, I grieve to say there are still worthy citizens of the Republic, all forgetful of the past, to whom the harmless doctrine of Federal sovereignty is even to-day the dismal owl in the rafters, foreboding something direful and deadly.

Have we not had enough of this weak and unworthy jealousy of national authority? It seems to me, sir, the demands of the hour summon us to a broader view and a juster recognition of the claims of the great body politic. Accepting the vital lessons which experience should teach, let it be henceforth our policy, as it is our privilege, to cherish both State and nation as parts of one grand unity, equally and alike the priceless heritage of the American citizen. Not the State before the nation, nor yet the nation before the State, but each first in its own proper sphere, and both indispensable to the inspiring problem of self-government this great and mighty people is working out.

The bill under consideration seeks not to invade the province of State jurisdiction. It proposes to deal with this subject in its national phases only. The ends it labors to accomplish are essentially national in their character, and can be regulated by no jurisdiction if not by Congress.

This brings us to what is involved in the power to regulate commerce among the States.

The bill under consideration proposes no innovation. It asserts no new or unprecedented doctrine. Railways are common carriers. The doctrine of the common law has always been that common carriers are subject to certain principles of regulation. They are required to serve the public, to serve all alike, to serve all for a reasonable compensation. These are the conditions upon which they are permitted to carry on their business. They cannot usurp the functions of common carriers, and hold themselves out to the world as such except upon these conditions.

"It is agreed," says Judge Cowen, in the case of Cole vs. Goodwin, (19 Wendell, 261,) "by all the books that, while the carrier enjoys the privileges of a common carrier, it is a duty he cannot escape in any form, to receive goods, if he has room to carry them, for a reasonable reward."

Parsons states the doctrine thus:

> He must carry the same amount the same distance for the same price for all persons.

This bill does not contemplate the actual fixing of rates by Congress, but leaves it just where the common law leaves it—to the decision of a jury. The adjustment of rates by the commissioners is only prima facie evidence of what are reasonable rates.

It seems to me very clear that Congress has the power to go further if it shall be found necessary. The power to regulate commerce among the States is, as we have seen, unlimited. The courts have adjudged that Congress has precisely the same power over commerce by railways as by steamboats and sail-vessels. The regulations imposed are, in their very nature, conditions on which commerce may be carried on. Call them police regulations or what you will, they are neither more nor less than conditions upon which a certain business may be prosecuted.

Now, sir, what is the prescription of rates but another condition on which this interstate traffic may be entered upon and conducted? How does it differ in essence or principle from the regulations which require that the machinery of a steamboat shall bear certain tests; that cargoes shall be packed and stored in a certain manner; that a certain number of watchmen shall be employed; that a certain number of life-boats and life-preservers and signal-lights shall be provided as conditions of engaging in the carrying business by such boats? The fixing of rates is but the making of a rule or regulation by which to ascertain the compensation for a given service.

It may be said that Congress has never attempted to fix rates for commerce by water. Certainly not; there has been no occasion. Combinations among sail-vessels and steamboats being impossible, or at least impracticable, competition has always regulated rates, just as it would by railways if combinations did not prevent.

Suppose the great through lines of railroad should enter into a combination to buy up all vessels of every kind employed in our inland commerce, and should thereupon double or triple the rates of transportation to the sea-board, are we to be told that the Government is utterly powerless to meet such an emergency? Is this authority conferred on Congress, to regulate commerce in the interest of the people, to give out just at the point where the cry for its protection is the loudest and the demand for its exercise is the most imperative?

Few graver questions have confronted American statesmanship. Here are 70,000 miles of railway, representing more than three thousand five hundred millions of capital, collecting from the people every year $473,000,000, practically under the control of a handful of men. This railway system stretches its Briarean arms from sea to sea. Its retainers and agents are in every community. Its possessions are more than princely. Behind it stands the keenest, sharpest brain-power of the nation. Its chiefs are kings. It is impossible to conceal the fact that it is a new and tremendous force in the national economy. It is impossible to measure or comprehend its ultimate influence upon our civil and social polity—upon our republican institutions. Properly controlled and regulated, it may be made a source of prosperity and development to the nation; uncontrolled it may sap the life-blood of the people. The necessity for its regulation by Congress seems to me to be absolute and irresistible.

Let me present the question in another way. It is now conceded that Congress has power under the clause of the Constitution before quoted to improve rivers and harbors, to construct light-houses, wharves, breakwaters, &c. Nor is it seriously doubted that Congress has power under the same provision to construct canals of a national character. If the interests of commerce require (of which Congress is the sole judge) I have no doubt of the power of the national Government to construct a canal at the mouth of the Mississippi, or around the Falls of Niagara, or from the lakes to tide-water.

Precisely the same reasoning would authorize the building of a railroad by the Government, if necessary to the commerce of the nation. If the Government can provide a canal or a railway under the power to regulate interstate commerce, it has, of course, the incidental power to fix rates for using the same. This is obvious.

If Congress has the power to build a railroad and prescribe the terms on which it may be employed, it must have the lesser power of regulating roads already constructed as to interstate commerce.

No one doubts that the States can exercise this power within State limits, unless they have bound themselves in the charter not to do so, and even in the latter case many of our ablest jurists, and some of our State courts, have decided that they may. The State of New York has for more than twenty years limited the fare over the Central Railway to two cents per mile. The State of Iowa, suffering from the custom of the railroad companies of advancing rates at the close of navigation, passed a law requiring the companies in the month of September in each year to fix rates of fare for passengers and freight, and on the 1st day of October to post up a printed copy of the same at all stations and depots, and prohibiting any advance in such rates during the year, under heavy penalty. This law, which at least indirectly fixes the rates and determines that they shall not be raised above the published standard, was sustained both by the State and Federal courts.

So the State exercises this power over ferries, street-railroads, and turnpikes; and also in controlling the rates for storage of grain, &c., in those cases where the business is a monopoly.

Now, all that we contend for is that Congress shall have, as to interstate commerce, precisely the same power which States may exercise as to local commerce.

In the January number of the American Law Register appears an article from the pen of the eminent jurist from whom I have already quoted, Judge Redfield, in which he discusses this subject and says, among other things:

> We are not aware that any fair question can be raised in regard to the right of Congress to control the fares and freights upon interstate railways. No such question has ever been raised in England in regard to the power of Parliament, and we do not comprehend how one could be raised in any country unless there were some constitutional restrictions upon the sovereign power.

Judge Dillon, of the United States district court, a gentleman who has few if any superiors in this country as a jurist, is known to hold the same views. In his notes, appended to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Clinton Bridge case, (American Law Register, volume 16, page 154,) he says:

> The necessity for some common, central legislative power [over railways] has been most seriously felt. Many of the evils to be remedied growing out of the rivalries and the selfishness of these corporations have proved to be beyond any effective State control.
> We rejoice to hear so careful and able a jurist as Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, declare that he has no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of the traffic carried on over any railroad which voluntarily becomes part of a line of interstate communication, and to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation justify or require it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in concluding what I have to say upon the legal phases of this question, I desire to remark that its final solution will not turn upon any fine-spun theories of State rights, or any hair-splitting adjustment of the powers and relations of State and national jurisdictions. When a great and free people like ours become thoroughly aroused and bent on the accomplishment of a vital object, it is a mistake to suppose you can obstruct their march with cobwebs.

Turn and twist this subject as you will, shroud it with all the subtilties of special pleading at your command, it comes back after all to this one simple proposition: Is the sovereignty of this Government a real and genuine sovereignty, or is it a sham? There is no middle ground. Either your flag waves over this grant of power, or it trails under it. Your authority to regulate is complete and plenary, or it is a mockery and a myth. A sovereignty in manacles is no sovereignty. He who supposes the people can be beguiled into the surrender of their weapons at the very threshold of the contest, misapprehends the firm resolve which stands behind this bill.

If Congress has power to actually prohibit commerce, as the Supreme Court has decided it has, it must have the power to prescribe the conditions on which it may be revived or prosecuted. It is a logical necessity. The whole must include every part.

But let me not be misunderstood. I desire to see no injustice done to railroads. I join in no indiscriminate and senseless war upon them. I recognize the important part they have had in the development and progress of the country. I cannot disguise the fact that they are intimately connected with the comfort, convenience, and general welfare of the whole people; that they are in fact an essential part of the very civilization of which we boast. There is no natural hostility to them on the part of the people.

The complaints we hear are not against railroads as such, but against their mismanagement; against their abuse of the franchises conferred by the people; against the combinations which they are continually making to prey upon the people and the honest stockholder.

The sentiment on this subject, which has at last made its way to the front, is one for which the managers of these institutions are alone responsible. Only a decent regard for the rights and interests of the people would have postponed this action indefinitely. Only last autumn, as if in utter defiance of the people, without provocation and without excuse, rates of transportation were advanced all over the West only to satisfy the greed of non-resident managers and unreasoning officials. And this is only one of numberless illustrations of the reasons which have culminated in an attempt to protect the just rights and interests of the people.

Now, sir, in conclusion, I will only add that the chief reason why I have sought to establish the power in the Government to deal with this subject is because I am anxious to find the needed relief in the regulation of existing lines of road rather than see the Government enter upon the system of constructing new lines.

The theory of Government railroads is one that should be carefully considered in all its bearings before its adoption. If the Government could construct a railroad from the sea-board to the Mississippi; if it could be honestly and efficiently managed in the interest of the people; if you could stop right there, and if two hundred millions could be spared from the Treasury for such purpose, there would be less demand for solicitude on the subject than now exists.

But, sir, when you once enter upon this system you will find it impossible to stop. If the Government can find a warrant for building a railroad from New York to Saint Louis for the benefit of one class or section, it will be called upon to build other roads for the benefit of other classes and sections, until it has usurped the management of all the important lines of transportation. A glance will show how this would come to pass. Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and Chicago would demand branches; and there is no ground on which their claim could be denied. Then would follow similar propositions on behalf of Detroit, Milwaukee, Council Bluffs, and other less prominent places. Ultimately other trunk lines would be required in the South and on the Pacific coast, and in the end the system would extend throughout our borders, requiring a vast army of agents and officials, and swelling the patronage and power of the Government beyond conception.

In my judgment the true policy to be pursued is twofold:

First, to make suitable provision for regulating interstate commerce over the great railroad lines. If the committee's bill fails to do this, let it be modified and perfected, but let it not be antagonized unless something better is offered in lieu of it. Any legislation on this subject must be experimental, and if found defective on trial can be changed. Something must be done at this session in the direction of this bill. The duty is cast upon this Congress to do whatever human wisdom can suggest to remedy existing evils, and this duty cannot be ignored or evaded.

In the second place, and as the complement of this legislation, I desire to see our water-ways improved to their utmost practical limit, with the least possible delay. I have no time now to elaborate. I would have these improvements entered upon in no narrow or sectional spirit, but with regard to the present and prospective demands of our vast inland commerce.

For one-half the cost of a double-track railway from New York to Saint Louis, the Mississippi River may be thoroughly improved from its highest navigable point to the ocean, including the Saint Philip Canal, at its mouth; a grand ship-canal be constructed around the Falls of Niagara on the American side; and the great States of the Upper Northwest be connected with Lake Michigan by way of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers.

This, I am persuaded, is the true and safe solution of the transportation problem. It involves no rash or questionable experiments, and opens up an easy, speedy, and economical way out of the present and pressing difficulty. If after this policy shall have been fairly tested it shall prove inadequate to the demands of our increasing commerce, it will be time to discuss other and less obvious methods of relief. But, sir, I have little fear that the plan pointed out, in conjunction with an efficient system of State legislation, will prove entirely adequate, and at no distant day place our internal traffic on the high vantage ground it is justly entitled to occupy.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, two questions have arrested and completely absorb public attention—finance and commerce. Whatever of momentary interest other subjects may have awakened in the popular mind, these alone have fixed and held the public regard. However important may be the result of our action in connection with other matters of legislation as affecting the various sections or interests of the country, our judgment upon these will be attended with the most momentous consequences to every individual and every industry within our borders. Whatever else we may do or leave undone, here there must be no mistake, no delay. Whatever apology may be acceptable to the people for errors elsewhere, none will be heeded or tolerated here.

There are times, sir, in the history of nations when the masses of the people, stung by some hideous wrong or struggling for some cherished right, rise in their majesty, and, moving with resistless power on realm and ruler, know no pause or peace but in revolution or reform.

So, sir, to-day the toiling millions of our countrymen, from farm and factory, field and forest, looking upon the prostrate and perishing industry of the many on the one hand, and the concentration of wealth and power in the hands of the few on the other, have risen as one man, and, inspired by a common sympathy and a common hope, breaking away from the restraints of all party affiliation, trampling down the feeble barriers of party control, and moving in unbroken phalanx upon all monopoly, whether of bank or railway, are demanding the recognition and practical operation of the truth, that this is a Government of the people for the people, and in its management there must be even-handed justice for all and unjust tribute to none.

Fortunate will it be for us—their servants—and doubly fortunate for the people and the country, their happiness and its prosperity, if we heed this demand and prove ourselves worthy of them and masters of the occasion. With this hope, let us seriously address ourselves to the work before us.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to submit some considerations, in connection with the bill before the House, bearing on the question of the power of the General Government to regulate commerce amongst the States when carried on through the instrumentality of railways chartered by the individual States. The bill, in other words, if I comprehend it, presents the grave question whether the Federal Government, under the Constitution, is vested with authority to regulate commerce among the States of this Union, when such commerce is carried on by railway corporations existing solely by virtue of State law; and whether such authority is broad enough to enable Congress to fix the tariff of charges for freight and passenger transportation over these established lines.

Such I understand to be the scope of the proposition under consideration; and in this broad sense I propose to consider it fairly and without evasion.

Whatever power the General Government is permitted to exercise over this subject can be legitimately derived only from the Federal Constitution. As far as it directs we may safely go. Beyond it we cannot venture without imminent peril. But, if I mistake not, we shall find within the scope of that instrument ample authority for the exercise of all such powers as will bring the interstate commerce of the country completely under Federal control.

The Constitution of the United States provides that—

> The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Stripping this provision of everything foreign to the matter under consideration, we have the broad and unrestrained authority conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce among the States. It is from this provision of the Constitution, if anywhere, that we are to derive the power to exercise that authority contemplated in the bill now before the House.

I shall endeavor, sir, in the presentation of my views upon this subject, to examine—

First, as to where this power rests, and its character;
Secondly, its restrictions;
Thirdly, its extent; and,
Finally, the necessity for its exercise.

WHERE THIS POWER RESTS, AND ITS CHARACTER.

Upon the first inquiry, and as lying at the foundation of this whole subject, I shall attempt to show that the power conferred upon the Federal Government by the Constitution of the United States "to regulate commerce among the States" is absolute, exclusive, and supreme; and that, whatever that power may be—and I do not now stop to define it—it is lodged solely in Congress. That while the States may prescribe all needful rules and regulations concerning that traffic which is purely domestic in its character, yet they have no more right to regulate that commerce which is among the States than they have to exercise any other power exclusively delegated to the General Government.

The express language of the Constitution would seem to place the question beyond all doubt and make argument unnecessary. Where else, let me ask, but in that instrument do you find authority given to any governmental power in this country to regulate commerce among the States? What State of this Union is clothed with such supreme authority? In what constitution of any of these States will you find the provision embodied in the Federal Constitution giving to such State the power to regulate commerce among the States? Can Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, or any other State in this Union, regulate commerce between itself and its sister State? If one State can exercise such authority, then all may; and when this is conceded and carried into practical operation you will find one State laying tribute upon the commerce of another, or several States lying directly across the pathway of the commerce of the great West, imposing such burdens upon it as utterly to destroy its value to the producer, or place it beyond the reach of all consumers but the most opulent.

If this power is not absolutely vested in Congress, but can be exercised by the States, then we shall go back to the dark days of the Confederation, and experience the very evils, the existence of which, more than any other one cause, led to the formation of our Federal Union. But fortunately for the peace and stability of the Government, and the harmony of these States, I believe this power was unconditionally surrendered to the General Government to be exercised by it, and it alone, without dictation or restraint, except so far as is imposed by the Constitution itself.

But, while contending that this power to regulate commerce among the States is absolute and supreme in the General Government, I am not unmindful of the fact that it has been intimated by the courts that, in the absence of the exercise of Federal authority over this subject, the States may assume such power. Sir, I do not believe that such a construction of this provision will stand the test of reason or is sustained by the current of authority. Is it possible that the States, having surrendered to the Federal Government certain powers, can resume these powers at will, if the General Government shall for any reason see fit not to exercise them? If Congress shall fail to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, may Maine do it? If Congress neglects to coin money or regulate the value thereof, may Michigan do it? May any State declare war in the absence of such declaration by Congress? If the Federal Government shall fail to regulate commerce with any of the nations of the world, could Pennsylvania or Massachusetts exercise such authority? Yet the same provision which confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The one is as broad and sweeping as the other. And as well may it be contended that a State may regulate commerce with foreign nations, in the absence of such regulation by Congress, as to contend that a State may regulate commerce among the States. Both powers are granted in the same provision of the Constitution.

Why, sir, the acknowledgment of such a power for a moment in a State would render nugatory this and every other provision of a like character in the Constitution and make the States coequal with the General Government in the exercise of that authority which was meant to be and is solely vested in the Congress of the United States. In these views upon this branch of the subject I am confident that I am sustained by reason and authority. This provision of the Constitution has been the subject of frequent examination and construction by the Supreme Court of the United States, and to those opinions, bearing directly upon this point, I invite the attention of the House. I think it will be found that they fully bear out the assertion that this power to regulate commerce among the States is alone with Congress, and is absolute, exclusive, and supreme.

Justice McLean, in the Passenger cases, (7 Howard, 392,) speaking of the exclusive power of Congress under the Constitution to regulate commerce, said:

Before the adoption of the Constitution, the States respectively exercised sovereign power, under no other limitations than those contained in the Articles of Confederation. By the third section of the sixth article of that instrument, it was declared that "no State shall lay any imposts or duties which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties entered into by the United States in Congress assembled;" and this was the only commercial restriction on State power. As might have been expected, this independent legislation, being influenced by local interests and policy, became conflicting and hostile, insomuch that a change of the system was necessary to preserve the fruits of the Revolution. This led to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Chief Justice Taney, in Holmes vs. Jennison et al., (14 Peters, 570,) said:

All the powers which relate to our foreign intercourse are confined to the General Government. Congress have the power to regulate commerce, to define and punish piracies.

When an authority is granted to the Union, to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant, there the authority to the Federal Government is necessarily exclusive, and the same power cannot be constitutionally exercised by the States.

Justice Johnson, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, used this language:

The power to regulate commerce here meant to be granted was the power to regulate commerce which previously existed in the States. The power to regulate commerce is necessarily exclusive.

The Supreme Court say, in Brown vs. State of Maryland, (12 Peters, 446:)

It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant of commercial power should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States. This question was considered in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in which it was declared to be complete in itself, and to acknowledge no limitations.

Justice Baldwin, in Groves et al. vs. Stoughton, (15 Peters, 511,) says:

That the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States is exclusive of any influence by the States, has been, in my opinion, conclusively settled by the solemn opinions of this court.

If these decisions are not to be taken as the established construction of this clause of the Constitution, I know of none which are not yet open to doubt.

Justice McLean, in the same case, said:

The necessity of a uniform commercial regulation, more than any other consideration, led to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. And, unless the power be not only paramount, but exclusive, the Constitution must fail to attain one of the principal objects of its formation. It has been contended that a State may exercise a commercial power, if the same has not been exercised by Congress, and that this power of the State ceases when the Federal authority was exerted over the same subject. This argument is founded upon the supposition that a State may exercise a power which is expressly given to the Federal Government, if it shall not exert that power in all the modes and over all the subjects to which it can be applied. If this rule of construction were generally adopted and practically enforced, it would be as fatal to the spirit of the Constitution as it is opposed to its letter. If a commercial power may be exercised by a State because it has not been exercised by Congress, the same rule must apply to other powers expressly delegated to the Federal Government. A power may remain dormant, though the expediency of its exercise has been fully considered. It is often wiser and more politic to forbear than to exercise a power. It is enough to say that the commercial power, as it regards foreign commerce and commerce among the several States, has been decided by this court to be exclusively given to the Federal Government.

Justice Story, in speaking of the doctrine of concurrent power in the States to regulate commerce, said:

In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden it was deliberately examined and deemed inadmissible by the court. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, with his accustomed accuracy and fullness of illustration, reviewed at that time the whole grounds of the controversy; and from that time to the present the question has been considered, so far as I know, to be at rest. The power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States has been deemed exclusive from the nature and objects of the power, and the necessary implications growing out of its exercise.

In Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, (4 Wheaton,) the court say:

Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum, and a grant of the whole to one, is incompatible with a grant to another, of a party.

Whenever the terms in which a power is granted by the Constitution to Congress, or whenever the nature of the power itself requires that it shall be exclusively exercised by Congress, the subject is as completely taken away from State Legislatures as if they had been forbidden to act upon it.

Justice McLean, in the Passenger cases, (7 Howard,) used this language:

When the commercial power was under discussion in the convention which formed the Constitution, Mr. Madison observed that "he was more and more convinced that the regulation of commerce was in its nature indivisible, and ought to be wholly under one authority." Mr. Sherman said, "The power of the United States to regulate trade, being supreme, can control interferences of the State regulations, when such interferences happen; so that there is no danger to be apprehended from a concurrent jurisdiction."

A concurrent power excludes the idea of a dependent power. A concurrent power in two distinct sovereignties to regulate the same thing is as inconsistent in principle as it is impracticable in action. It involves a moral and physical impossibility. A joint action is not supposed, and two independent wills cannot do the same thing. The action of one, unless there be an arrangement, must necessarily precede the action of the other; and that which is first, being competent, must establish the rule. If the powers be equal, as must be the case, both being sovereign, one may undo what the other does, and this must be the result of their action.

But the argument is that a State may regulate commerce until Congress shall act on the same subject; and that the State must then yield to the paramount authority. Is a commercial regulation open to State action because the Federal power has not been exhausted? Shall free goods be taxed by a State because Congress has not taxed them? Shall passengers, admitted by act of Congress without a tax, be taxed by a State? The supposition of such a power in a State is utterly inconsistent with a commercial power, either paramount or exclusive, in Congress. That it is inconsistent with the exclusive power will be admitted; but the exercise of a subordinate commercial power by a State is contended for. When this power is exercised, how can it be known that the identical thing has not been duly considered by Congress? And how can Congress by any legislation prevent this interference? A practical enforcement of this system, if system it may be called, would overthrow the Federal commercial power.

Whether I consider the nature and object of the commercial power, the class of powers with which it is placed, the decisions of this court in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden and reiterated in Brown vs. The State of Maryland, and often reasserted by Mr. Justice Story, who participated in those decisions, I am brought to the conclusion that the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," by the Constitution, is exclusively vested in Congress.

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

The want of this power was one of the leading defects of the Confederation, and probably, as much as any one cause, conduced to the establishment of the Constitution. It is a power vital to the prosperity of the Union; and without it the Government would scarcely deserve the name of a national government, and would soon sink into discredit and imbecility. It would stand, as a mere shadow of sovereignty, to mock our hopes, and involve us in a common ruin.

In the case of the Reading Railroad Company vs. Pennsylvania, (15 Wallace, 232,) the railroad claimed that the statute of the State, so far as it imposed a tax on freight other than that both received and delivered within the State of Pennsylvania, was unconstitutional and void, because in conflict with this provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Justice Strong, in this case, said:

It is not necessary to the present case to go at large into the much debated question, whether the power given to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States is exclusive. In the earlier decisions of this court it was said to have been so entirely vested in Congress, that no part of it can be exercised by a State.

The court here referred to the Ogden case, Passenger cases, and 3 Wallace, 713.

It has indeed often been argued, and sometimes intimated by the court that, so far as Congress has not legislated on the subject, the States may legislate respecting interstate commerce. Yet, if they can, why may they not add regulations to commerce with foreign nations beyond those made by Congress, if not inconsistent with them? For the power over both foreign and interstate commerce is conferred upon the Federal Legislature by the same words. And certainly it has never yet been decided by this court that the power to regulate interstate commerce, as well as foreign commerce, is not exclusively in Congress.

Cases that have sustained State laws, alleged to be regulations of commerce among the States, have been such as related to bridges, &c., wholly within a State. However this may be, the rule has been asserted with great clearness, that whenever the subjects over which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform plan or system of regulation, they may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Surely transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State, or from one State to another, is of this nature. It is of national importance that over that subject there should be but one regulating power; for if one State can directly tax persons or property passing through it, or tax them indirectly by levying a tax upon their transportation, every other may, and thus commercial intercourse between the States remote from each other may destroyed. The produce of Western States may thus be effectually excluded from eastern markets; for though it might bear the imposition of a single tax, it would be crushed under the load of many.

In Houston vs. Moore, (5 Wheaton 23,) the court say:

We are altogether incapable of comprehending how two distinct wills can, at the same time, be exercised in relation to the same subject, to be effectual, and at the same time compatible with one another.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, said:

It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

The sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects.

The power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions.

Where, then, each government exercises the power of taxation, neither is exercising the power of the other; but when a State proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, it is exercising the very power that is granted to Congress, and is doing the very thing which Congress is authorized to do.

Whether, therefore, we examine this provision of the Constitution in the light of reason or authority, we must be forced inevitably to the conclusion that the power to regulate commerce among the States, whatever that power may be, is exclusively in Congress, and that such power knows no restriction or restraint except such as is placed upon it by the Constitution itself. And this brings me to the second point of my argument—

THE RESTRICTIONS UPON THIS AUTHORITY.

And here there can be no question that this power in the Federal Government to regulate commerce is confined solely to interstate commerce, and does not extend to that commerce which is purely domestic in its character, and concerns only the individual State. The control over such commerce is exclusively with the States. While I have not the slightest sympathy with that pernicious doctrine of State rights which thrusts its hateful tenets into the discussion of almost every question on the floor of this House, engendering a spirit of jealousy and hostility among these States, threatening their peace and stability, yet there can be no hesitancy in declaring that such commerce as is purely domestic in its nature and confined within the limits of a particular State, is entirely within the control of such State; and Congress has no more power over such commerce than it has over the domestic commerce of England. There is a State and there is an interstate commerce; and the distinction between the two is clearly and sharply defined. The former is as absolutely within the control of the State as the latter is within the jurisdiction of Federal authority. Can it be difficult to determine what is State commerce and what is interstate commerce; where State authority ceases and Federal authority begins? When an instrument of commerce takes the grain of a farmer from his granary in one part of a State and carries it to another part of the same State as its final destination, that is commerce entirely within that State, and subject alone to the control of that State. So long as the instrument of commerce has its termini within the limits of a State, and engages in moving no merchandise which comes from without or is destined to a point beyond the limits of such State, it is engaged solely in domestic commerce, and Congress has no power to regulate it. In this view of the case I have but given expression to the oft-asserted and, I believe, well-settled doctrine of the courts of this country.

In the Passenger cases, to which I have before referred, Justice McLean said:

No one doubts the power of a State to regulate its internal commerce.

All commercial action within the limits of a State, and which does not extend to any other State or foreign country, is exclusively under State regulation. Congress have no more power to control this than a State has to regulate commerce "with foreign nations and among the several States."

In Corfield vs. Coryell, (4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports,) Justice Washington used this language:

But this power, which comprehends the use of and passage over the navigable waters of the several States, does by no means impair the right of the State governments to legislate upon all subjects of internal police within their territorial limits which are not forbidden by the Constitution of the United States.

In the case of United States vs. Holliday, (3 Wallace, 416,) Justice Miller said:

The commerce here regulated is a commerce wholly within a State, among its own inhabitants or citizens, and is not within the powers conferred on Congress by the commercial clause.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, to which I have already had occasion to refer, said:

The subject to which the power is next applied is to commerce "among the several States." The word "among" means intermingled with. A thing which is among others, is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior. It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce, which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Comprehensive as the word "among" is, it very properly may be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose, and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended would not have been made, had the intention been to extend the power to every description.

The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated, and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State. The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere, for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself.

The case of the Daniel Ball, decided in 1870, and reported in 10 Wallace, clearly draws the line of distinction between State and interstate commerce.

This case arose under the following circumstances: In March, 1868, the steamer Daniel Ball was engaged in navigating Grand River, in the State of Michigan, between Grand Haven, at the mouth of the river, and the city of Grand Rapids, some forty miles in the interior. The boat was engaged in the transportation of merchandise and passengers between those places, without having been inspected or licensed under the laws of the United States.

The United States filed a libel in the district court for the western district of Michigan, to recover the penalty provided for want of such inspection and license.

The act of July, 1838, provided that it shall not be lawful for the owner, master, or captain of any vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, to transport any merchandise or passengers upon the bays, lakes, rivers, or other navigable waters of the United States, without having first obtained a license under existing law; and that, for every violation of the act, the party offending shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $500; and that for this sum the vessel engaged was liable, and might be seized and proceeded against summarily, by libel, in the district courts of the United States.

The libel further averred that Grand River was a navigable water of the United States, and also alleged that the steamer transported merchandise shipped on board of her, destined for ports and places in States other than the State of Michigan, and was therefore engaged in "commerce between the States." The answer admitted most of the allegations—that the steamer was engaged in navigation between Grand Rapids and Grand Haven, and in the transportation of merchandise and passengers between those places; that she was not licensed nor enrolled; that some of the goods that she shipped at Grand Rapids and carried to Grand Haven were destined and marked for places in other States than Michigan, and that some of the goods which she shipped at Grand Haven came from other States, and were destined for places within that State. It was claimed, however, by way of defense, and not denied, that the vessel drew but two feet of water, and was incapable of navigating the waters of Lake Michigan; that she was a common carrier between the cities named, but did not run in connection with or in continuation of any line of steamers or vessels on the lake, or any line of railway in the State. The points of defense relied upon were two:

First. That Grand River was not a navigable water of the United States.

Secondly. That the steamer was engaged solely in domestic trade and commerce, and was not engaged in trade and commerce between two or more States, or in any trade by reason of which she was subject to the navigation laws of the United States, or was required to be inspected and licensed. It was claimed that the fact that some portion of the merchandise shipped was destined for points beyond the limits of the State, or was received from points without the State, did not bring her within the control of Federal authority, in which alone is vested the power of regulating commerce "among the States," so long as she did not go beyond the limits of the State in which she was engaged. The district court dismissed the libel, the circuit court reversed this decision and gave a decree for the penalty demanded, and the Supreme Court of the United States affirms the decree of the circuit court. I read only that portion of the opinion bearing upon the point under discussion, Justice Field delivering the opinion of the court:

But it is contended that the steamer Daniel Ball was only engaged in the internal commerce of the State of Michigan, and was not, therefore, required to be inspected or licensed, even if it be conceded that Grand River is a navigable water of the United States; and this brings us to the consideration of the second question presented.

There is, undoubtedly, an internal commerce which is subject to the control of the States. The power delegated to Congress is limited to commerce "among the several States," with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes. This limitation necessarily excludes from Federal control all commerce not thus designated, and of course that commerce which is carried on entirely within the limits of a State, and does not extend to or affect other States. In this case it is admitted that the steamer was engaged in shipping and transporting down Grand River, goods destined and marked for other States than Michigan, and in receiving and transporting up the river goods brought within the State from without its limits; but inasmuch as her agency in the transportation was within the limits of the State, and she did not run in connection with, or in continuation of, any line of vessels or railway leading to other States, it is contended that she was engaged entirely in domestic commerce.

But this conclusion does not follow. So far as she was employed in transporting goods destined for other States, or goods brought from without the limits of Michigan and destined to places within that State, she was engaged in commerce between the States, and however limited that commerce may have been, she was, so far as it went, subject to the legislation of Congress. She was employed as an instrument of that commerce; for whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade from one State to another, commerce in that commodity between the States has commenced. The fact that several different and independent agencies are employed in transporting the commodity, some acting entirely in one State, and some acting through two or more States, does in no respect affect the character of the transaction. To the extent in which each agency acts in that transportation, it is subject to the regulation of Congress.

It is said that if the position here asserted be sustained, there is no such thing as the domestic trade of a State; that Congress may take the entire control of the commerce of the country, and extend its regulations to the railroads within a State on which grain or fruit is transported to a distant market.

We answer that we are unable to draw any clear and distinct line between the authority of Congress to regulate an agency employed in commerce between the States, when that agency extends through two or more States, and when it is confined in its action entirely within the limits of a single State. If its authority does not extend to an agency in such commerce, when that agency is confined within the limits of a State, its entire authority over interstate commerce may be defeated. Several agencies combining, each taking up the commodity transported at the boundary line at one end of a State, and leaving it at the boundary line at the other end, the Federal jurisdiction would be entirely ousted, and the constitutional provision would become a dead letter.

In the light of these authorities, I am at a loss to understand how any one can have the slightest difficulty in discovering the boundary line between the State and Federal jurisdiction in the matter of regulating commerce. It is distinct and well defined; and there is no reason for any conflict of authority between the local and the General Governments. Each has its separate and distinct sphere of action; yet they move together in perfect harmony under the sovereign control of two central powers.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to my third inquiry—

THE EXTENT TO WHICH THIS POWER TO REGULATE COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES MAY BE EXERCISED.

And here I think I may safely affirm that to regulate commerce is not to simply prescribe the rules of traffic between the States, but it extends to the instruments of commerce, and places under Federal control everything affecting interstate commerce. What is commerce, and what is the extent of the power to regulate commerce among the States? Our courts have not been silent upon this question, but have repeatedly declared the extent to which this authority may be exercised.

Justice Strong, in the Pennsylvania case to which I have already referred, said:

Beyond all question the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of sale or exchange, is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. A power to prevent embarrassing restrictions by any State was the thing desired. The power was given by the same words and in the same clause by which was conferred power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It would be absurd to suppose that the transmission of the subjects of trade from the State to the buyer, or from the place of production to the market was not contemplated, for without that there could be no consummated trade either with foreign nations or among the States.

Also in Gibbons vs. Ogden, the court say:

The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of one nation into the ports of another, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals, in the actual employment of buying and selling, or of barter. If commerce does not include navigation, the government of the Union has no direct power over that subject, and can make no law prescribing what shall constitute American vessels, or requiring that they shall be navigated by American seamen. Yet this power has been exercised from the commencement of the Government, has been exercised with the consent of all, and has been understood by all to be a commercial regulation. It was so understood, and must have been so understood, when the Constitution was framed.

The words used in the Constitution, then, comprehend, and have been always understood to comprehend, navigation within its meaning; and a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if that term had been added to the word "commerce."

The subject to be regulated is commerce. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse.

In its simplest signification, commerce means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various mediums of exchange, become commodities, and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation, ship-building, the carrying trade and propagation of seamen, are such vital agents of commercial prosperity, that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects, would not possess power to regulate commerce. But it is almost laboring to prove a self-evident proposition, since the sense of mankind, the practice of the world, and continual exercise of the power, have so clearly established the right of Congress over navigation and the transportation of both men and their goods, as are not only incidental to, but actually of the essence of, the power to regulate commerce.

Again, they say:

It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. It has been truly said that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term.

Story, in his work on the Constitution, says:

"To regulate commerce." The power is to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. The subject to be regulated is commerce. Is this limited to traffic, to buying and selling and the interchange of commodities, or does it comprehend navigation and intercourse?

Commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more. It is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches.

In the Clinton Bridge case this doctrine is distinctly affirmed. This case arose under the following circumstances:

In 1861 a bill was filed in the United States court for the district of Iowa, complaining of a bridge across the Mississippi River, on the ground that it obstructed navigation, and asked its abatement as a nuisance. Authority to construct the bridge had been obtained from the State of Illinois by special act of the Legislature, and from Iowa under the general law of the State on that subject. The bridge was constructed on the Iowa side, at Clinton. The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, running from Chicago to Clinton, was built and in operation. On the opposite side of the river, and running to Cedar Rapids, was the Cedar Rapids Railroad, and so on from Cedar Rapids other lines were in process of construction, which, when completed, would connect with the Union Pacific, so that from Chicago westward, over several States, commerce would be carried on crossing the Mississippi on this bridge.

Proofs were taken, and a hearing postponed from time to time, until Congress, in February, 1867, passed an act declaring the bridge a post-route and lawful structure. A motion was made by the defendants to dismiss the bill, on the ground that this act took away the jurisdiction of the court in the case.

The motion was resisted upon several grounds, and among others it was contended that the act of Congress was unconstitutional in several particulars, but specially in this, that Congress had no power to authorize or regulate bridges over the navigable streams of the United States.

Justice Miller, in his opinion, makes use of this language:

The second of these objections involves the consideration of the commercial clause, as it is appropriately called, of the Constitution. The power to regulate commerce is one of the most useful confided to the Federal Government; and its exercise has done as much as that of any other to create and foster that strongest bond of nationality, a community of interests among the States. The want of it was one of the most pressing necessities which led to the formation of the Constitution. The clause has always received at the hands of the courts and of Congress a construction tending liberally to promote its beneficent object. The power to regulate commerce is the power to regulate the instruments of commerce. In the case of Cooley vs. The Board of Wardens, (12 Howard, 299,) the court says that "the power to regulate navigation is the power to prescribe rules in conformity with which navigation must be carried on. It extends to the persons who conduct it as well as to the instruments used." Navigation is here spoken of as one of the subjects of legislation included in the power to regulate commerce.

In this view of the subject Congress has passed statutes regulating steamboats, their construction, equipment, officers, and crews, prescribing qualifications of pilots and engineers, limiting the number of passengers they may carry, and prescribing the signals they shall use in passing each other; in short, it has established a minute code for building and navigating those vessels. The right to do this depends wholly on the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce, and has never been disputed.

From this, Mr. Speaker, we see something of the extent to which this power has been exercised, and may be exercised, by the Federal Government over commerce when carried on by water. Who doubts but that the same power may be exercised over commerce among the States, however carried on? It is commerce that Congress is empowered to regulate. Can you prescribe rules and regulations for the safety of commerce when carried on by steamboat, and cannot enforce the same rules and regulations for the safety of the same commerce when carried on by a steam-car? I shall attempt to demonstrate, by equally well-settled authority, that Congress may regulate commerce to the same extent when carried on by land. The power to regulate commerce among the States cannot be confined to any particular mode of conducting that commerce. It must apply to commerce among the States, however conducted. In reason there can be no distinction between the power over commerce when carried on by water and when conducted by land. It is commerce just the same; and the power to regulate it must be the same.

Justice Washington, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell, (4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, 378,) said:

The first question, then, is, whether this act, or any section of it, is repugnant to the power granted to Congress to regulate commerce.

Commerce with foreign nations and among the several States can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations and among those States for purposes of trade, be the object of the trade what it may; and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States, or by a passage overland through the States, where such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the States. It is this intercourse which Congress is invested with the power of regulating, and with which no State has a right to interfere.

Justice Strong, in Reading Railroad Company vs. Pennsylvania, (5 Wallace, 271,) used this language:

Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or by water. In either case the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce. Among the States it must have been principally by land when the Constitution was adopted.

In the Clinton Bridge case, to which I have just alluded, Justice Miller said:

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce, as well as when it is carried on by water; and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in the one case as in the other. The "commerce among the States" spoken of in the Constitution must, at the time that instrument was adopted, have been mainly of this character, for the steamboat, which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers, was then unknown.

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted. By it merchandise is transported across States and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has, with great benefit, been subjected to the control of salutary congressional legislation. Is there any reason why the other should not be? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and which is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that when these roads become parts of the great highways of our Union, acting an important part in a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce both with foreign nations and among the States, and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government. For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of any of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads, when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it. * * *

Further on the court say:

In these cases the judges have been speaking of navigation. But the terms of the Constitution are not confined to that mode of conducting commerce. Any other means of commerce are obviously within its terms. I have shown that railways are now means of interstate commerce as well as steamboats. Their iron tracks, extending from ocean to ocean, are no more limited by political boundaries than are the rivers which rise in one State and flow through others to the sea. Over the former, propelled by one application of the motive power of steam, roll many cars laden with the products and fabrics of one section of the country for the supply of the wants of a distant section. Through the latter, propelled by another application of the same power, ply the steamers, laden in like manner, and discharging a like beneficial office. Where lies the difference between them? Why should not the power which regulates one extend to the control of the other?

From these authorities it must be evident that this power to regulate commerce among the States extends to such commerce however carried on; and that the same rules and regulations for the protection of commerce by water may be enforced against a railroad company engaged in such interstate commerce by land. The power in the General Government must be the same in both cases.

But it is said that the bill before the House contemplates the exercise of a power which heretofore has not been assumed; that it is now proposed to so far extend this authority as to allow the General Government to interfere in the question of prices to be charged by the railroad companies for transportation when engaged in interstate commerce. That the bill contemplates the exercise of such a power there is no question; and that it goes further than any regulation has heretofore gone is equally true. But the fact that this power has never been exercised may possibly prove no more than that the exigency requiring its use has never before arisen. Certainly it cannot be argued that because it has never been invoked therefore it does not exist. Such a conclusion does by no means follow.

Does the power of Congress cease with the instrument of commerce? If a railroad company shall engage in interstate commerce, in regulating that commerce have we no greater power than to prescribe the qualifications of the engineer; the number of hands to be employed on each train; the number of tons each car shall carry; the number of passengers allowed in each coach; and the general details of constructing and managing these roads so that the safety and security of men and merchandise may be assured? Is this the extent of our authority? If so, it is "a barren scepter;" and the railroad companies have it in their power to place such tariff upon commerce among the States as to utterly destroy it. It is not of these things that the people complain, but it is of the excessive charges and unjust discrimination which strike at the very soul and life of all commerce.

I hold that the power to regulate commerce among the States is broad enough—indeed it is the very essence of that power—to allow Congress to regulate in some measure the charges for transportation. If we have not this power, a railroad company chartered by a single State, going outside of its chartered privileges and engaging in interstate commerce, is independent of both State and Federal authority, so far as the tariff of charges is concerned, and is above all law and subject to its own sovereign will. If Illinois, lying directly across the pathway of the commerce of the great West, can control the railroads within her limits and then engage in interstate commerce, and is above all regulation by the General Government as to charges for transportation, she can make the entire commerce of the great West lie at her feet and pay her tribute. Or if the corporations she charters, engaging in such commerce, are above all Federal and State control in the matter of charges for transportation, then may one man hold in his hand the material prosperity of forty millions of people.

It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Pennsylvania case, to which I have before referred, that a State cannot tax the tonnage passing over its road; that such a tax is a regulation of commerce; that it directly affects commerce among the States, and rests only with Congress. But it is also held by the same authority that a State may tax the gross receipts of a railroad company, which would allow a State to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. Under this rule a State might charter a railroad company to go through its borders with unlimited discretion in the matter of charges, and so allow a heavy burden to be placed upon commerce. Nay, more, might directly connive at it, that it might fill its own coffers by a tax upon receipts, at the expense of the commerce of the entire nation.

This commerce which Congress is vested with power to regulate, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, is a unit, (that is his language,) every part of which is indicated by the term. Intercourse is commerce. Can the railroad company make such charges for that intercourse as to destroy it, and so far destroy commerce? Traffic is commerce. Can a railroad company make it so expensive by exorbitant charges as to absolutely prevent it and thereby destroy commerce? Why, sir, if this doctrine be correct, the States in their sovereign capacity have created a power not only above State control, but above national control—a power which may engage in that traffic which Congress alone can regulate and carry it on without dictation from the Federal Government. Nay, sir, you have a power which may make commerce among the States prosperous, or can annihilate it at a blow and render valueless one of the greatest industries of the people.

Let me close what I have to say upon the power of Congress to regulate the fare and freight over railroads engaging in interstate commerce by reading an extract from an article published in the January number of the American Law Register, from the pen of the Hon. Isaac F. Redfield, whose opinion upon this subject is entitled to great consideration. He says:

But the most interesting question just now affecting the regulation of this traffic by Congress is how far, and in what mode, the legislation of Congress may control and define the rate of charge upon interstate railways, whether by way of tolls or of fare and freight. Fare and freight upon all interstate railway traffic are wholly under the control of Congress to the same extent they are in England under the act of Parliament, or in any other sovereignty under the governing power, whether legislative or executive. And this congressional regulation and control attach to interstate traffic, not only where it has actually been carried across the dividing line of two States, but from the moment it is taken in charge by the carrier as traffic, whether in goods or persons, and which is destined to cross State lines in its transit. We are not aware that any fair question can be raised in regard to the right of Congress to control the fares and freights upon interstate railways. No such question has ever been raised in England in regard to the power of Parliament, and we do not comprehend how one can be raised in any country, unless there were some constitutional restriction upon the sovereign power.

In the absence of all such restriction the supreme power might impose conditions upon existing companies which would annihilate their business at once. This is admitted by all in regard to the legislative power of the British Parliament, and we have never been able to find any one who could assign any sensible reason why the legislative power of the American Legislatures, both State and national, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, should be less than that of the British Parliament.

But we are told that these railroad companies have been clothed with certain rights and privileges under State charters, and that the General Government has no power to interfere with these vested rights. The bill proposes no interference. It counsels none. It does not contemplate an interference with these chartered privileges; and no possibility of construction could torture it into such a purpose. Neither does it in any way infringe upon the reserved rights of the States. The familiar dogma of State rights, invoked against the use of the powers proposed to be exercised under this bill, is as foreign to this discussion as it is fallacious and ill-timed. The bill concedes to the States the right, which all must acknowledge, to grant to a corporation the power to construct railroads within their borders to engage in domestic commerce. With this the bill does not propose to interfere. It is only when these corporations step over this line, go beyond their chartered rights, and engage in interstate commerce, that the powers contemplated by this bill are to be carried into exercise. Such commerce no State has the right to regulate. It is certainly beyond its power. How idle, therefore, the cry of State rights and State sovereignty when Congress proposes to exercise that authority, and that only, which the States have absolutely and unconditionally surrendered to the Federal Government.

It is not, therefore, a question between Federal power and State authority, but between Federal power and railroad power. It is the simple proposition whether Congress, under the Constitution, has power to regulate commerce when carried on by rail, or whether these corporations are above all law and beyond all control. If these corporations can securely shelter themselves behind the doctrine of State sovereignty, then they are more powerful than the Government itself, and they are indeed masters of the situation. For if the General Government has not power to regulate interstate commerce it exists nowhere, and these railroad kings are indeed "monarchs of all they survey."

In the clear light of the Constitution and unquestioned authority it cannot but be admitted that the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the States is absolute, exclusive, and supreme, and embraces within its jurisdiction everything which directly affects the carrying on of such commerce.

NECESSITY FOR THE EXERCISE OF THE POWER.

Mr. Speaker, a word in conclusion as to the necessity for the exercise of this power, and I have done. Nearly a century, sir, has passed since we entered upon our national career, and these years have wrought a marvelous change in the extent and resources of our country. Then your feeble commerce, confined to the Atlantic coast, found easy and ready access to foreign and domestic markets. But what do you behold to-day? Across the Ohio and the Mississippi has rolled the rushing and resistless tide of emigration, over valley and mountain, arrested only by the waters of the western sea. Men of the East! these are your brothers and sons, who, emulating your virtues and your valor, subduing forest and savage, have carved out of this trackless wilderness twenty-seven States and Territories, and crowded them with seventeen thousand people, industrious, heroic, and free. One million four hundred thousand improved farms, containing two hundred million acres, at an estimated value of $5,000,000,000, bear witness to the energy and frugality of this great people. Four hundred cities adorn her valleys; two hundred chartered colleges afford ample means for the education of her children, while twenty-four thousand temples invite to the worship of the God of their fathers.

This mighty people in the main are tillers of the soil, gathering from these acres an annual product of $1,200,000,000. The value of these products depends in no small degree upon the facility and cheapness with which they can be placed in the markets of the world. I would therefore make broad and deep every river within her borders as the means of the cheapest transportation, and through which her exuberant commerce might float unobstructed to the sea.

But, when you have accomplished this great work, the difficulty is not wholly removed. There are seasons of the year when these natural avenues are closed by the severity of our climate, during which period these products must perish or seek outlet through the State and over these interstate railroads. If no restrictions can be imposed upon these corporations, the entire commerce of the West may be at the mercy of a single man, and such tribute may be imposed upon it as to utterly destroy its value to the producer, or place it beyond the reach of all consumers but the most opulent.

That this commerce has felt the burden of unjust taxation at the hands of these railroad monarchs no one would presume to deny or justify. Seventy-one thousand miles of iron rail interlacing these States have enabled a few men to wield a power over commerce at once dangerous and destructive. But not here alone has its power been felt. It has manipulated caucus and convention, made and unmade Legislatures, tampered with the purity of the judiciary; nay, more, it has stalked with royal retinue through the lobbies of this Capitol, marking its victims and smiling upon its pliant retainers.

I know, sir, it is as much as a man's political fortunes are worth to stand in the pathway of this almost omnipotent power; but while I will go as far as "who goes farthest" in protecting these corporations in the enjoyment of every just right, they shall do no wrong to the humblest citizen if my vote or my voice can prevent it.

In this spirit come the six million tillers of the soil, and ask protection at our hands. They come not with bullet nor bayonet; not with hostile banner, but with the ballot, that mighty—

Weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
But executes the freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God.

Mr. Speaker, I have sought, in this discussion, to avoid everything which might be construed into an effort to array one class or interest against another, or which might have the slightest tendency to provoke a spirit of hostility between the various sections of our common country.

Reprehensible as may be the conduct of individuals or corporations in their dealings with the people, oppressive as may be the iron rule of gigantic monopolies upon the industries of the masses, yet that will not furnish the slightest apology for an attempt from any quarter to engender the spirit of enmity and aggression between the rival interests of our broad country. Diversified as these interests may be, they each contribute to the growth and the grandeur of the whole.

Sir, we are, and must be, one people, bound together by the indissoluble ties of a common origin, cheered by the promises of a common hope. With the people, under the Constitution, rests the power of a peaceful solution of all these difficulties. Let us then, knowing no North, no South, no East, no West, nothing but one common country, without fear or favor, passion or prejudice, redress the wrongs of each, while we protect the just rights of all; that all interests, all sections, and all the people may conspire to promote the growth and grandeur of the Republic, under one flag and one Constitution, henceforth and forever.

Mr. EDEN obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. EDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. COX. I am honored with the presentation of a memorial, headed by Peter Cooper, Cooper, Hewitt & Co., Phelps, Dodge & Co., L. P. Morton & Co., J. S. Schultz, A. A. Low & Brothers, N. L. & George Griswold, and others who have made commercial life the synonym of enterprising virtue, in favor of enacting such legislation as may insure the full success of the centennial celebration, and to take such prompt, efficient, and liberal action as may be needed to facilitate the thorough organization of the international exhibition. I have been requested by one of the most eminent of the New York merchants to present this paper and to assist in some efficient way in the success of the undertaking, and to say that the men who signed this memorial are representatives of the liberal mercantile element of the great metropolis. To speak of such men would be to attempt to gild refined gold. To meet their wishes in respect to the centennial, if compatible with the relations which a New York Representative should bear to such an event, will be my own highest wish. But, sir, I would prefer, as a member of our Federal Congress, to favor a national, instead of an international, celebration.

I ask unanimous consent to have the memorial referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the proposed National Census of 1875.

Mr. BURCHARD. Can that be done by unanimous consent?

Mr. COX. It can, unless the gentleman objects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals, "to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States," is intended to effect such a radical revolution in the whole internal commerce of the country, that it challenges the closest scrutiny upon the part of the representatives of the people.

"Each and every line of railroad extending into or through two or more States, and employed in carrying freight or passengers between points or places in different States, and whether owned and operated by one company, corporation, or person, and known by one name, or owned and operated by several companies, or persons, and known by several different names, shall be regarded as employed in commerce among the several States," and are subjected to the provisions of the bill.

Corporations and individuals engaged in operating such lines of railroad are prohibited from charging, collecting, demanding, or receiving more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll for the transportation of freight of any kind, or of passengers, or for the use or transportation of any railroad-car upon its track, between places in different States.

The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is to appoint a board of nine railroad commissioners, to be selected from the several judicial circuits of the United States, to hold office for a term of six years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President; and to receive as compensation for their services the sum of $4,000 per annum each, and their actual necessary traveling expenses. These commissioners are to be divided into three classes; the first class to continue two years, the second class four years, and the third class six years.

The railroad commissioners are authorized to appoint a secretary at an annual salary of $3,000. It is made the duty of these commissioners to prepare for the owners and operators of each of such lines (of railroad) a separate schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight cars on or over said lines respectively, and, when necessary, to amend or revise such schedules.

Any corporation, company, or person engaged in operating any line of railroad through two or more States, or parts of States, who shall, after such schedule of rates shall have taken effect, demand or receive more than a reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of freight, passengers, or cars over any such line, shall forfeit and pay for each offense a sum not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, to be recovered by action to be brought in the name of the United States in any district or circuit court of the United States, &c., in the form of an action of debt, &c. If the charges of such transportation exceed the rate of toll or compensation fixed by the commissioners' schedule, the defendant shall be held guilty of extortion, unless such defendant shall show affirmatively that the rate charged is fair and reasonable.

Following the line of argument adopted by the committee in their report, I will inquire, first, whether Congress under the Constitution has the power to enact such a law; and, secondly, whether, if constitutional, it is expedient.

I admit the first proposition stated by the committee—

That the "commerce among the several States," which may be regulated by Congress, includes commerce carried from State to State by railroad.

But I deny the second proposition laid down by the committee, as follows:

That to regulate the charges for carrying freight or passengers upon interstate railroads so as to limit them to what is fair and reasonable and prevent extortion, is a legitimate exercise of the power to regulate such commerce.

In my judgment the second proposition is supported neither by reason nor authority.

One of the leading objects for calling the convention that made the Constitution was to confer upon the General Government power to regulate foreign commerce and commerce among the States. Under the Articles of Confederation each State could impose import and export duties, limited only by treaty obligations. Each State could impose taxes upon the products of all the other States when brought into or passing through the State for the purposes of trade. The establishment of conflicting rules and regulations for foreign and interstate commerce by the several States, was a constant source of irritation under the Articles of Confederation, and threatened the disruption of the Union.

Upon the adoption of the Constitution the power of Congress was speedily invoked to remedy the evils resulting from the conflicting commercial regulations of the States, in so far as such regulations affected commerce with sister States and foreign powers. All laws of the States imposing taxes in any form on traffic or articles of trade passing beyond the boundary of the States respectively became inoperative on the adoption of the Federal Constitution. In order that no State should have an advantage over any other State the Federal Constitution prohibits the imposition of a tax or duty on articles exported from any State and giving a preference by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another, and the requirement of vessels bound to or from one State to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

I refer to these provisions of the Federal Constitution because it is a received canon of construction of that instrument that the power given to Congress by the Constitution is limited by the object to be accomplished.

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution commerce among the States was obstructed by conflicting laws. States favorably located with reference to foreign commerce imposed taxes upon the products of their less favored sisters seeking a foreign market; and also upon goods imported from foreign countries for consumption in the States. These burdens bore unequally and unjustly upon the people in some parts of the country; and to remove these evils the power to regulate commerce was conferred upon the General Government.

There was no complaint under the Articles of Confederation that interstate commerce was in any manner oppressed by excessive charges for transportation. Neither was it foreseen, so far as shown by the discussions preceding the adoption of the Constitution, that any evil requiring Federal intervention was likely to arise from such charges. Hence no provision was incorporated in the Constitution which by any fair construction can be tortured into a support of the position that Congress has the power to fix the prices of any of the constituents of commerce. The legislation of Congress upon the subject up to the present time has been confined to the making of rules and regulations as to the manner in which commerce among the States should be carried on; leaving the prices of all the commodities used in commercial pursuits to be fixed by the agreement of parties engaged in the business. The decisions of the courts referred to in support of the pending bill are all made in the interest of commercial freedom, and against the right assumed by some of the States to tax articles of trade in passing from foreign countries into a State, or from one State to another.

The case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton,) referred to by a distinguished United States Senator from Indiana, as well as by the committee in their report, as an authority in support of the position of the bill, is not in point. The Legislature of the State of New York granted to Livingston and Fulton the exclusive navigation of all waters within the jurisdiction of that State, with boats moved by fire or steam, for a term of years. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that act, so far as it prohibited vessels licensed according to the laws of the United States for carrying on the coasting trade from navigating the said waters by fire or steam, to be repugnant to the Constitution.

There are other authorities referred to, both by the Senator from Indiana and the Committee on Railways and Canals, defining what constitutes commerce, and also deciding that commerce among the States when carried on by railroads is subject to the regulation of Congress.

The Passenger cases, referred to in support of the bill, reported in 7 Howard, 283, decide against the validity of State laws imposing a tax upon passengers from foreign countries coming into the ports of a State. The advocates of the power of Congress to fix the prices of freight and passengers on interstate railroads content themselves with authorities showing that Congress has the power under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States. This power is conceded. The question at issue is whether the power to regulate commerce, within the meaning of the Constitution, includes the power to fix the prices of the instruments of commerce and the commodities exchanged between citizens of different States.

The inquiry does not lead us to a consideration of the power of Congress over navigable streams passing through more than one State. These are highways of commerce belonging to the public, in which there is no individual or corporate ownership, and over which Congress can certainly exercise the power to regulate commerce, subject only to constitutional limitations. Yet the proposition has never been made, to my knowledge, for Congress to fix the rate of fare to be charged for carrying freight and passengers upon navigable streams passing through or by more than one State. While Congress may regulate interstate commerce, no matter whether carried on by land or water, I venture the assertion that where the facilities of commerce are artificial, created under the authority of State law, and owned by the State, or by individuals or corporations, such regulation must respect the rights of the owners of such facilities. It is not denied that the States have the power to authorize the construction of railroads, nor that when constructed by individuals or corporations such roads are private property, though subject to the public use. The States' power of eminent domain is brought into requisition to procure the right of way. The Federal Government has no agency whatever in the construction of such a road, nor has it any sort of interest in the same when constructed. Upon what principle, then, of right or justice can the Federal Government, after the State, in the exercise of a constitutional right, has granted a charter for the construction of a railroad, and individuals in puruance of legal authority have invested their money in the construction and equipment of such a road, step in and take charge of the business of the company and control the same against the will of the State and of the owners of the road?

It is not denied by the advocates of the bill before the House that the charter granted by the State to the corporation in such case is a contract between the State and the company that is binding upon both parties. It is conceded that the State may reserve the right under the contract to limit or fix the tolls to be charged by the company for transporting freight and passengers, or may permit the company to fix such tolls subject to the common-law liability in case of extortion or unjust discriminations.

Here, then, we have a legal and valid contract, entered into by the State and the railroad company. It has been fully executed. Both parties are bound to abide by the terms of the contract. Will it be contended that the Federal Government, not having the power to forbid the execution or performance of this contract, can come in after the terms are complied with by both parties and rescind the contract? Would such an arbitrary and despotic act be regulating commerce among the States? What would be the condition and rights and remedies of the two contracting parties after this third party, not having any interest whatever in the making, performing, or the subject-matter of the contract, had interposed and set it aside? In such case what becomes of the valuable consideration which has been given and received? Can the parties be placed in statu quo?

It is said that the Congress has the exclusive power to regulate commerce among the States. Grant it. It is equally true that the States have the exclusive power, within their own limits, to construct or authorize the construction of railroads. Congress has no more right to interfere with a State in the performance of a constitutional act than has a State to interfere with Congress in the execution of a power delegated to it. It follows that the State should not interfere with the General Government in regulating commerce among the States; nor should Congress interfere with a State in the construction and operating of railroads within its own borders. The power of the State to make, or cause to be made, railroads and other facilities of commerce within its limits can be fully executed without interfering with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. So the power of Congress can be applied to the regulation of interstate commerce without in any manner interfering with the right of the State to control railroads constructed under its authority. When these railroads are used for the purpose of transporting goods or persons from one State to another, the customary tolls can be charged as compensation to the carriers; but the State can lay no tax either upon the goods or persons in transitu. The State cannot forbid the use of the railroad to persons engaged in interstate commerce upon the payment of the charges for transportation, or interpose any obstacle to the free interchange of commodities between the States. The General Government is clothed with the power to prevent any obstruction under State authority to the freedom of interstate commerce. I take the position that it is competent for the States by law to fix reasonable maximum rates for freight and passenger tolls on all railroads within the States and constructed under their authority; and that freight and passengers transported over such roads and passing from one State to another may be required to pay the tolls so fixed by law. When the State fails to enforce this right, the persons or corporations owning or operating such roads may fix such reasonable tolls as a compensation for the use of the road and other facilities of transportation. Should the corporation fail to perform its duties as a common carrier, the persons injured would have to look to the laws of the State for redress.

It is claimed that to charge tolls as a compensation to the carrier and for the use of a railroad and its equipments in transporting persons and property from one State to another, is regulating commerce among the States, within the meaning of the Constitution.

Is this position correct? If so, no matter whether the amount charged be reasonable or excessive, when any charge is made the same becomes a regulation of commerce, and Congress must intervene and establish the price. The amount charged for the service does not give Congress jurisdiction over the subject. No agency except Congress can establish the amount of the charge, or without the authority of Congress make any charge at all. For, be it remembered, the power of Congress over the subject is exclusive.

Sir, I propose to show that the authorities do not sustain such an extraordinary assumption of power. In the Passenger cases, (7 Howard, 283,) Justice McLean, in giving the opinion of the court, says:

> An inquiry is made whether Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the States, can impose a tax for the use of canals, railroads, and bridges constructed by a State or its citizens. I answer that Congress has no such power. The United States cannot use any of these works without paying the customary tolls. The tolls are imposed not as a tax, in the ordinary sense of the term, but as compensation for the increased facility afforded by the improvement.

The court here makes the distinction between a tax and a toll. A tax upon commerce is a regulation of commerce; but a charge for facilities furnished and services rendered is simply compensation.

We find that the General Government, with all its supposed omnipotence upon the subject, cannot even regulate the price that it will pay for the use of a railroad, but must pay the customary tolls.

The committee, in their report, refer to the case of The Reading Railroad Company vs. Pennsylvania, 15 Wallace, 232, to sustain the power of Congress to establish by law the price of freight on interstate railroads. In that case Justice Strong, in giving the opinion of the court, says:

> We concede the right and power of the State to tax the franchises of its corporations, and the right of the owners of artificial highways, whether such owners be the State or grantees of franchises from the State, to exact what they please for the use of their ways. That right is an attribute of ownership. * * * Tolls and freights are a compensation for services rendered, or facilities to a passenger or transporter. * * * A tax is a demand of sovereignty; a toll is a demand of proprietorship. * * * The right to make terms for the use of the roadway is in the grantee of the franchise, not in the grantor.

The distinction here is clearly taken by Justice Strong between the exercise of a power to regulate commerce and the right to exact tolls and freight as a compensation for services rendered, and facilities furnished to passengers and transporters. A legislative act, imposing a tax upon commerce or prescribing the manner in which it shall be conducted, is an act of sovereignty, and imposes burdens upon those engaged in commerce for the benefit of the State or the security of the public. Regulations of such a character cannot be imposed by the State upon commerce among the States. Freight and passenger charges on railroads are made in order to compensate for the use of the road and equipments; are matters of contract between the carrier and transporter, and for their mutual benefit, and do not necessarily involve the exercise of any legislative power. The tax or other regulation, which is an act of sovereignty, is a regulation of commerce. The freight or passenger charge, which is compensation for services or facilities furnished, is an act of ownership, not involving an act of sovereignty, and consequently is not a regulation of commerce.

In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden this view of the subject is very forcibly presented by Justice Johnson. He says:

> As to laws affecting ferries, turnpike roads, and other subjects of the same class, so far from meriting the epithet "commercial regulations," they are in fact commercial facilities, for which, by the consent of mankind, a compensation is paid, on the same principle that the whole commercial world submit to pay lighter-money to the Danes.

The case of Veazie vs. Moore (14 Howard, 568) is directly in point. The State of Maine had passed an act giving to a citizen the exclusive right to the navigation of a portion of the Penobscot River, above the point where the same was navigable without artificial improvements, for a period of twenty years, upon his making certain improvements that would increase the length of the navigation. The improvement was made, and formed a connection with navigable waters used in foreign commerce. The suit was instituted to test the right of the grantee to have the exclusive use of that part of the river made navigable by his improvements. Justice Daniel, in giving the opinion of the court, says:

> Nor can it be properly concluded that because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce, that the control of the means of encouragement by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase "foreign commerce," or fairly implied in any investure of the power to regulate such commerce. * * * For there is not one of these avocations, the results of which may not become the subjects of foreign commerce, and be borne either by turnpikes, canals, or railroads, from point to point within the several States toward an ultimate destination, like the one above mentioned. Such a pretension would effectually prevent or paralyze every effort at internal improvement by the several States; for it cannot be supposed that the States would exhaust their capital and their credit in the construction of turnpikes, canals, and railroads, the remuneration derivable from which, and all control over which, might be immediately wrested from them, because such public works would be facilities for commerce which, while availing itself of those facilities, was unquestionably internal, although intermediately or ultimately it might become foreign. The rule here given with respect to the regulation of foreign commerce equally excludes from the regulation of commerce between the States and the Indian tribes the control over turnpikes, canals, or railroads, or the clearing and deepening of water-courses exclusively within the States, or the management of the transportation upon and by means of such improvements.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the position I have taken, that the fixing of tolls and freights on railroads is not a regulation of commerce, is fully sustained both by reason and authority.

The committee in their report claim that—

> The power of Congress in the matter of controlling and regulating interstate commerce is coextensive with the power of the States over their completely internal commerce.

And because the States have the power to limit the charges on railroads chartered by State authority within the limits of the States, the illogical conclusion is drawn that Congress has the power to fix freight charges on the same railroads, for the bill takes jurisdiction of roads built exclusively under State authority.

The case of Alcott vs. The Supervisors, (16 Wallace, 679,) referred to by the committee in support of this position, does not find the power of the State over the road as an incident to the regulation of commerce. Because the State Legislature authorizes a private corporation to take land for the construction of a railroad, making compensation to the owner, under the State's power of eminent domain, the court says that such a road is a public highway, and "can therefore be controlled by the State. Its use can be defined; its tolls and rates for transportation may be limited."

By a parity of reasoning we might say, as such a railroad is not constructed under the authority of Congress, nor the land taken under the Federal Government's right of eminent domain, and is not a national highway, that it "cannot therefore be controlled by Congress; its use defined, or its tolls and rates for transportation be limited." It is a proposition too clear for argument, that both the State and Federal governments cannot limit the tolls and rates for transportation on the same railroad; and as the Supreme Court has decided that where the railroad is built under State authority, the State has the power to regulate tolls and rates of transportation, the power of Congress is necessarily excluded.

The committee also claim that Congress has the power to pass this bill, because "at common law it was a violation of the obligation of a common carrier to charge unreasonable or excessive compensation for the discharge of any of his duties."

Mr. Speaker, I have been taught to look to the enumeration of powers in the Constitution for authority for congressional action.

The common law is not incorporated in the Constitution, and is not a part of the law of the Union. In the case of Wheaton & Donaldson vs. Peters, (8 Peters, 658,) the Supreme Court in giving the opinion in the case says:

> It is clear there can be no common law of the United States. The Federal Government is composed of twenty-four sovereign and independent States, each of which may have its local usages, customs, and common law. There is no principle which pervades the Union, and has the authority of law, that is not embodied in the Constitution or laws of the Union. The common law could be made a part of our Federal system only by legislative adoption. When, therefore, a common-law right is asserted, we must look to the State in which the controversy originated.

It will thus be seen that in order to get the benefit of the common law in reference to the duties of common carriers, the party injured must seek his remedy in the State where the injury was inflicted, and not in the halls of Congress.

Is this species of legislation to stop with the fixing of rates of transportation by railroads? In order to act with efficiency in the establishment of tolls and freight charges, the prices of labor and materials used in repairing and operating the roads must also be established by law. The object sought by fixing the charges for transportation by Congress is to make such charges reasonable. Unless the cost of repairing and operating the roads is reasonable, rates of transportation cannot be made reasonable. Again, the owners of railroads expect to realize an income on the money invested in their construction and operation. The rate of interest on the bonded debts of railroads is an element to be considered in establishing reasonable charges for transportation. Hence the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States must be brought to bear to reduce the interest charge fixed by the contract between the railroad company and the holder of the bonds when necessary to secure reasonable rates for transportation. There is no half-way ground. Once we admit the power and undertake to execute it, we must take under the control of Congress and fix the price of every element that enters into the expenses to be paid by the company out of the earnings of the road. Where the amount of income is established by law, unless there is also a limit to the expense account in proportion to the income, bankruptcy will soon overtake the company.

Mr. Speaker, if the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States can be so construed as to include the right to fix the prices of freight, will not the same construction enable Congress to fix the prices of every commodity and of all the instruments used in such commerce?

The demand to-day for the regulation of the price of freights on railroads by Congress, arising out of the oppressions of the farmers of the West from exorbitant rates, may be supplemented by a demand made next year to fix the prices of provisions transported from one State to another, arising out of the necessities of the starving people in the cities of the sea-board.

Upon what rule of construction can it be claimed that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the States, can fix the price of the commodity called freight and cannot fix the prices of all other commodities when used as elements of interstate commerce?

Sir, the bill before the House is the initial measure which, if successful, will be followed up by a system of legislation that will in the end overthrow every vestige of both individual and State rights. It is a declaration of the omnipotence of Federal legislation over every industry in the country. The committee in reporting the bill might well liken the power of Congress to that of the British Parliament, and seek by their report, not for a grant of power, but for a limitation upon the power of Congress.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to inquire as to the expediency of the measure before the House. If Congress has the power claimed for it by the committee, I ask if it is the part of wisdom to surrender the power into the hands of the Executive. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. He has under his control the Post-Office Department, with all its vast machinery and patronage. He has under his command an army of revenue officers. Over three hundred millions of money is every year disbursed by the executive branch of the Government. Three hundred and fifty million dollars of the circulating medium of the country are issued by national banks under the direction and control of the Treasury Department. An innumerable host of Federal office-holders stand ready to do the bidding of the President. And yet Congress, claiming the power to establish the rates of freight and passenger charges on railroads operated in two or more States, shrinks from the performance of that duty, and devolves it on nine commissioners to be appointed by the President, and removable at his pleasure. These nine men will have the power to enrich or impoverish every railroad company in the United States. They may, if they choose, drive commerce from every great city by discriminating against them in freight charges, and force commerce to new centers by discriminating in their favor.

The commissioners will have power to establish rates that will keep Illinois and Iowa out of the markets of the world, and to favor Ohio and Indiana by rates that will enrich their people. Seventy thousand miles of railroad will be subject to the control, to a greater or less extent, of these nine commissioners. Each railroad company will rush to the autocrats of interstate commerce to beg or buy favors. The people of every city in the United States will be suppliants at their feet for favors. The great manufacturing establishments will be compelled to bow down before this new idol that is about to be set up for worship. There will be no power higher than the commissioners, except the will of the President to remove them in case they fail to do his bidding.

When this system of legislation shall have been fully inaugurated there will be no further use for a written Constitution; no necessity for State governments. Under a latitudinous construction of Federal power, whatever policy may, for the time being, seem to commend itself to public opinion, can be carried out by congressional legislation.

When a proposition is gravely presented to the consideration of the American Congress to place under the control of the President of the United States the larger portion of the internal commerce of the country, we may well be alarmed as to what may follow.

It has been said that the interstate commerce is now controlled by a few leading railroad men. There is doubtless more or less combination between the managers of different railroad lines to the prejudice of the people. Yet they are managed with a view to business, and the profit of the stockholders. In order to avoid the evils of railroad combination, shall we withdraw their management from the control of business men and place it in the hands of politicians, to be used as an element of partisan success? What business is carried on by the Government that is not made subservient to the interests of the party in power? When this great bureau of interstate commerce, of which this bill is but the corner-stone, shall have been established, with its power reaching out into every State and every county in the Union; with its army of clerks and agents, whose ranks will be rapidly recruited after the passage of the bill; and clothed with the power to add to or subtract from the value of all exchangeable commodities, and to appreciate or depreciate the value of all railroad securities by simply changing the rates of transportation, the dominant party will have under its control an engine of political power that will render it invincible.

If the success of the Government in its past management of business affairs gave promise of relief from the evils of railroad monopoly, there would be some inducement to engage in the experiment proposed by the bill. Upon this point we are not without warning. The connection of the Government with the Pacific railroads involved the country in a debt of $65,000,000, and developed the Credit Mobilier swindle. To-day the country stands appalled at the developments of fraud and extortion practiced upon the business interests of the country by the agents of the Government in the collection of internal taxes and customs.

A few years ago the whisky ring was swindling the Government annually of untold millions on account of the whisky tax. The Judiciary Committee of the House has its calendar darkened with cases of impeachment against United States judges. The Federal administration has overthrown the power of the people in the State of Louisiana, and installed a usurping government in its place; which has been followed by a repudiation of the debt of the State.

Wherever the Federal Government has undertaken to engage in business pursuits not absolutely necessary for purposes of Government, such undertakings have been carried on at great pecuniary loss, and the expenditure of the people's money in such enterprises has been marked with profligacy and corruption. Yet, sir, with all these examples before us it is proposed by this bill to make almost the whole of the internal commerce of the country an element of executive patronage, and to put it in the power of the official appointees of the President to cause constant and arbitrary fluctuations in the values of all the products of labor.

I believe that the Legislature of the State of Illinois has asked Congress to take the railroads built by that State, and under its authority, and in large part by the aid of counties, towns, and cities, from the control of the people of that State, and to place them under the control of the Congress of the United States. By this resolution, I undertake to say that the Legislature misrepresents the rights, interests, and wishes of the people to whom I appeal. When the Congress of the United States untertakes to legislate in reference to the purely domestic affairs of the citizens of the State of Illinois, an injury is thereby inflicted upon her people, and an indignity is offered to her sovereignty.

Should this bill become a law, in my opinion a contest will be inaugurated, the result of which will be, either that the Government will in the end own the railroads, or the railroads will own the Government, with the chances of success in favor of the railroads.

CURRENCY AND FINANCE.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I can say for myself that I bring to the consideration of this important subject a mind possessed of no preconceived prejudices. A subject of such vital interest to the people, affecting in its far-reaching consequences every man, woman, and child in the Republic, should receive at the hands of Congress a calm and dispassionate consideration.

In times of panics or popular commotions we are more apt to consider what, for the time being, may be pleasing to the few unfortunate persons involved, rather than that which may serve to correct the evil in the future and to avoid its recurrence.

The demagogue in politics is like the quack in medicine. He prescribes what he thinks will be pleasing to the patient for the present, at the same time he knows he is not removing the cause of the evil.

The true statesman, on the other hand, is like the true physician; although he knows his remedy will not for the present gratify his subject, yet he is willing to incur his displeasure if in the end he may be able to effect a permanent cure. However painful the operation, he will apply the knife in order to save the life of his patient.

We have on this floor, Mr. Speaker, some of the former class; they talk loudly about being engaged in a contest for "cheap money," against the "credit-mongers" and "bullionists" of the world. I have no doubt such cheap talk as this will win applause from some men, who have been doing business for the last few years in violation of all the laws of sound trade, and have been indulging in over-trading and carrying on wild railroad enterprises. But the sound business judgment of the country will condemn it, as it has already.

These quacks affect a lofty disdain for the teachings of schools and the wisdom of the past. One of them has declared in debate that he had not studied the men who spent their lives in investigating this subject. Mill, Hume, Ricardo, et hoc genus omne are stupid asses. They prefer to follow the teachings of Carey and Elder, who flourished under the shadow of the old United States Bank, and whose best exponent and mouth-piece on this floor is my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] from Philadelphia.

Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to say this subject is not beset with great difficulties and complications. It is much easier to criticise plans and remedies, and to say what ought not to done, than to propose what should be done. While finance is a science, it is not an exact one. It is not like the science of geometry, where you can propound your theorem and demonstrate it, so that the demonstration may defy contradiction; but it is an empirical science, in which, by a process of a wide induction of facts, certain general and ultimate principles have been ascertained.

I know there are some who contend that the whole subject is involved in such inextricable confusion that one man's opinion is as good as another's. I dissent from this entirely. No, Mr. Speaker; by the experience of all civilized nations, running back for centuries; by the careful and patient study of the laws of trade and of statistics, certain great, leading, and fundamental truths have been established, which constitute the science of political economy, and every statesman of modern times acts upon them. When they have been adhered to, prosperity has followed; when departed from, adversity and disaster have been the result.

Let me state some of these ultimate truths:

That money, as such, is a medium of exchange and a standard of value.

That it ought to be some object which has some fixed amount of value, and as unvarying as possible.

That gold and silver best unite all the requisites for a medium of exchange and standard of value.

That a mixed currency is from its nature unsteady and fluctuating, both in quantity and quality.

That a mixed currency stimulates credit at one time and depresses it at another.

That a credit currency has a constant tendency to demonetize and drive out of circulation the value currency.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we were to regard money simply as a medium of exchange, as my learned colleague [Mr. KELLEY] would seem to regard it, it would not make much difference whether it was a value currency or a credit currency; whether it was paper or coin. The gambler's "chips," for the purpose of the game, are to him as valuable as the money they represent. If it were only a medium of exchange, like a cart or a boat used in transferring values from one person to another, any conventional article might do. But it is more; its great function is to measure values. And to talk of an "elastic" currency is the veriest solecism imaginable. We might as well talk of an elastic yard-stick, which at one season of the year might be twenty-four inches, at another forty-eight inches. Under our present currency it is about thirty-two inches.

The experience of the world is that the precious metals alone perform this important function. By the manner in which they are scattered over the world, and the certain amount of labor required to bring them into a state fit for money, they have come to possess, the world over, a certain amount of value.

Fixedness of value resulting from fixedness of quantity constitutes the chief advantage of the precious metals over all other objects as a standard of value. Wheat, for instance, possesses value and is in universal demand; but to produce a bushel of wheat this year may cost one dollar, and the next two. So that every object would rise or fall as compared to wheat according as it was plenty or scarce. But it is not so with gold. Providence has come to the aid of man in the manner this product is dispersed throughout nature.

The experience of England, France, and our own country has been that it is unsafe to rely upon a paper currency. Our experience in 1837, and again in 1857, corroborates me in the statement. A purely paper currency, while it is expanding, stimulates credits; then money is plenty; everything is advanced in price, and then we have the "good times" my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] praises so much.

But now see the other side of this picture. The Government, or the bank, as the case may be, cease to expand. Having largely overloaned, they must now not only cease to loan, but call in what they have loaned. Men go to the banks, but they can get no accommodation. Nay, not only so, but in the late panic they could not get their own deposits. Manufacturers, merchants, and tradesmen of all kinds begin to feel the pressure. One of them fails, and his failure drags down twenty more perhaps, having business relations with him; confidence is shaken, the wheels of business are clogged, and we are in the midst of a panic, which in one day sweeps away the fortunes of a life of honest toil and labor.

Such has been our experience again and again. Such, too, has been the experience of Great Britain under a paper currency, and such will continue to be our experience till we come down to a hard-money basis, the money intended by the framers of our Constitution.

The great evil of a paper currency is, that when you once commence the temptation to exceed the proper limit is generally too great to be resisted. It costs so little to make it; rags are cheap; and you have only to set the press in motion and the money is made. The earlier statesmen of the country long ago understood this tendency to overissue.

Hamilton, who cannot be considered an enemy to paper money, said:

> The stamping of paper [by the Government] is an operation so much easier than laying taxes or borrowing money that a government in the habit of paper emissions would rarely fail, in any emergency, to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource to avoid, as much as possible, one less auspicious to present popularity.

Benton has said:

> As a currency, it is the most seductive, the most dangerous, and the most liable to abuse of all descriptions of currency.

To the same effect is the testimony of Jefferson, Madison, Randolph, and Webster.

It is like the pernicious practice of taking morphine; small doses may do at first, but larger ones must follow if the practice is not entirely abandoned.

When a currency is mixed, consisting partly of coin and partly of paper, and the paper irredeemable, the latter will demonetize the former, and not only drive it out of circulation but out of the country. Currency, like any other commodity, cannot escape the law of supply and demand. This is emphatically so when the coin currency possesses a greater current value than the paper currency. Gold and silver go abroad; the paper stays at home. When we have an overissue of money, like water, it will seek its own level; but the precious metals alone will run off, while our depreciated paper will stay at home.

This fact alone makes the adjustment of the proper proportions of the different kinds of currency a nice question in finance. The instant one kind of currency becomes more valuable than another, it disappears, thus reversing the Darwinian theory that the "fittest survives."

Benton says on this point:

And this is the third time in twenty years that paper money has suppressed specie as now [1837] it suppresses it; for this is a game [the war between gold and paper] in which the meanest and the weakest is always the conqueror.

We have also a practical illustration in our own financial history. Up to 1838 the proportion of gold to silver, by weight, was 15 to 1. This proportion was too small; gold was undervalued and disappeared. The proportion was then changed by law from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1, and gold again appeared.

The most valuable currency is hoarded. A man having two kinds will pay out that which he regards of the less value or of the smaller purchasing power. My colleague wants a self-adjusting system. So do I. But no invention of legislation can make an irredeemable paper currency self-adjusting; whereas a gold currency, or a paper currency based upon gold, will adjust itself without any effort of legislation.

There is a certain amount of gold in the world in circulation; it is honored and recognized by all civilized nations as a standard of values, and is the only instrument by which international exchanges are effected, and by which balances of trade are adjusted.

As I said before, when our currency is redundant, the excess has a tendency to go abroad; and gold and silver, being the only recognized currency of the world, of necessity have to go. But if, after the gold has left us, the balance of our paper circulation is redundant, then it must depreciate. But the moment the paper currency becomes too small it rises and appreciates gold, and becomes as valuable, and the deficiency in the volume is made up by an influx of foreign coin. Here we have a self-adjusting and self-regulating system, founded upon the immutable law of trade, requiring none of your "subtile principles" of legislative intervention.

My colleague [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] have been quite facetious about the "world's currency;" that Germany would not recognize French coin in the payment of her indemnity; that Bismarck required the French government to melt down her coin and weigh it out to her. I see nothing in this but an exercise of arbitrary power, intended to insult a prostrate foe, by compelling her to strike from her coin the symbol of sovereignty.

Fortunately for this unfortunate nation her stamp gave no value to her coin; it answered the purpose in the payment of the indemnity as well in its molten state as it did when the proud eagle of France was stamped upon it. But had France been in the condition of the United States, and had then been compelled to strike from her greenbacks or her assignats the symbol of sovereignty, my friend from Ohio could see, I trust, the value of the "world's currency." No; gold is to-day what it was in the days of Abraham, the "current money with the merchant" in Asia, Africa, Europe, and America. And I hope the day is not far distant when we may have a system of international coinage, by which a traveler may make the circuit of the globe, without being obliged to call upon any banker to have exchanges adjusted for him.

Have we too much currency to-day, or have we too little?

England, to whom we generally go for comparisons, has a population of about thirty-two millions, and a circulation of nearly $600,000,000; amount per capita, $18.75.

The United States have a population of forty-one million, and a paper circulation of $772,000,000; amount per capita, $18.83.

So that, in reality, we have a larger paper circulation, irredeemable in coin, than Great Britain has in coin and paper together. Her paper is redeemable in coin, and considerably less than half of her circulation. I have excluded our gold and silver from the above statement. And I would also state that the reserve required to be held in Great Britain is greater than in this country.

In 1860 our paper circulation was about $202,000,000, and that, with the coin, gave us a per capita circulation of only $14.50, so that we actually have now a per capita circulation of $4.25 more than we had in 1860. And yet we hear the cry of "more currency." Besides, bills, promissory notes, drafts, and checks have come into such universal use, that there is not the necessity for as much money as formerly to carry on exchanges.

It is well ascertained through the clearing-house transactions of London and New York that no more than 1 per cent. in coin and 5 per cent. in paper is required to carry on the great mercantile operations of the world. This tendency to the economization of money is greatly on the increase. One dollar in gold in New York or London through the aid of bank-checks, &c., does the business of one hundred dollars.

But, Mr. Speaker, after all, what is the true test of limit for circulation? I contend it is the fact of depreciation alone; that every argument drawn from wealth, population, territorial extent, &c., is not to be relied upon. The depreciation of our currency can be accounted for in two ways only: either it is redundant or it is insecure. That it is not insecure no one believes; the faith, the honor, and property of the country are pledged to the payment of our paper circulation. It is not possible to conceive of a form of indebtedness possessing a higher security. Then what is the only other explanation of this depreciation but that it is redundant? Certainly none. They have the same security that our entire bonded debt has, and the issue in excess of the demand of trade accounts for their depreciation. The moment the Secretary commenced to issue the legal-tender reserve gold went up, or, more correctly speaking, greenbacks went down. And if the Treasury Department had not transcended its proper functions, and had not interfered with the business transactions of the country, we would to-day be so near specie payments that the difference between gold and paper would be very small.

In seeking a remedy, the cause of the disease must first be ascertained. Most find it in overtrading, the importation of luxuries, speculation in stocks, wild railroad schemes. But these are not causes; they are rather effects. I have already hinted at the great producing cause of our late panic, to wit, undue expansion of our paper credit. Although panics sometimes break upon us suddenly, and with all the violence of a hurricane, yet the cause has been silently at work for years. Those few years of prosperity that we usually hear of just before a panic are generally the very years in which the evil is at work. The panic only seems to mark its period of culmination.

We commenced inflation in February, 1862; money became plenty; we repeated the dose in July the same year, and again in March, 1863, till we had about $450,000,000. In June, 1864, we opened again the flood-gates of currency by the national banking act, and almost doubled the amount of it, and literally deluged the country with paper money. These paper promises were, in the history of our country, financial nondescripts. The United States notes were redeemable in nothing, payable at no time, bore no interest, and were legal tender for the payment of all debts except duties on imports and the interest on the public debt.

What, Mr. Speaker, was the result? Why, then we had what the gentleman from Philadelphia so much desires now, cheap money; and we had it with a vengeance. Property of all kinds went up like a balloon. The people had more money than they wanted. Real estate was sought after by some for investment, and it rose 100 per cent. Stock speculations enticed some; luxuries were sought after; fine houses were purchased by many; foreign travel and fashionable summer resorts were enjoyed by many. The glorious years of 1865, 1866, and 1867 were the years when the "shoddies" ruled society. In addition to this, wild railroad enterprises were commenced, which my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] in his exceedingly able and sound speech has so well commented on. Speculation went on; but the issue of paper money had ceased, and gold went abroad in one continuous stream to pay for silks, wines, and other needless luxuries, and to adjust an unfavorable balance of trade.

The war and the demoralization of a paper currency had turned from farming and stock-raising no inconsiderable portion of our people. But as the price of everything had been nearly doubled, there soon began to be felt the necessity for more currency. The Treasury Department did for several years what it could to avert the impending disaster, which every man who had learned the A B C of finance knew was sure to come. It has now come, and the penalty for a violation of the true principle of currency has to be paid. Let us bear it with all the patriotism and patience we can command.

Thus do I maintain that an undue expansion of our paper money brought about the panic. In thus arraigning it I do not wish to be understood as imputing bad faith or want of wisdom to those who brought it about. Under the circumstances they did the best they could, and that is a sufficient vindication of their patriotism.

Nor do I wish to be understood as saying that the evils of expansion were not aggravated by grave defects in the law. The system of national banking gave a strong tendency to currency to flow to the financial centers. Naturally it would do this; but when you made these centers places for the redemption of the national-bank notes, you greatly increased the tendency. But when these banks commenced to pay interest on their deposits the evil was fearfully aggravated.

Why should banks pay interest on deposits? The safe custody of the funds, responsibility for their loss, readiness to pay them over when called for, are sufficient compensation for the depositor. These deposits represent the surplus capital of the nation not engaged in active trade, and have generally constituted a large source of profit to banks. No bank should be allowed to purchase its deposits. It is injurious to the bank in the end, as well as to the community.

The country banks, during the spring and early summer, accumulate a large amount of deposits for which they find no investment.

They send them to the large business centers, to be deposited in the banks, and receive from 4 to 6 per cent. interest. The city banks, to make something out of these deposits, must do one of two things, namely, must either use them in excess or in illegitimate business. They must loan them at high rates of interest. None but stock-gamblers will pay it. And thus the money finds employment in wild speculations which bring about our "Black Fridays." If the banks do not prefer to aid the gold and stock gamblers, but desire to loan to the mercantile community, they must loan too close. In the fall there is a demand for the money in the country; they make their "calls" upon the city banks and they are "short," and cannot respond. The depositing banks cannot get at their own deposits, and thus the country is deprived of the currency at the very time it needs it most. This must be prevented by legislation.

I know it will be said that shaving-shops and private bankers will get all the deposits by paying a low rate of interest. If this should be so, the Government must not put itself in competition with the shaving-shops of the country. When the national banks cease to pay interest, they can loan cheaper; and any community will soon learn that the proper place to deposit money is where it can go and borrow on reasonable terms. And it is to be hoped that the different States may soon take such action as will place all these private banking institutions in harmony with the national banking system on the question of interest on deposits.

There must also be a stringent enforcement of the act of March 3, 1869, which makes it unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any national bank to certify any check drawn upon such bank unless the person or company drawing such check shall have, at the time the check is certified, an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check.

It is impossible to conceive of a more vicious practice than the manner of certifying checks, which has grown up among our national banks. It is violative of one of the most positive and explicit statutes on our books. It erects the teller or cashier of the bank into a board of directors; it gives to these officers the right of deciding who shall enjoy the credit of the bank without consulting those in whom the law vests that delicate and important duty. A practice so dangerous and monstrous the New York Clearing-House Association has condemned in the strongest terms by saying that—

> The amount of such checks which have passed daily through the clearing-house has reached in some instances to twice and three times, and in one or two to four and five times, the capital stock, and this through long periods of time.

The interests of the community and of the stockholders of the banks alike condemn this practice, and demand such legislation as will in the future suppress it.

Mr. Speaker, what is our duty in the premises?

The act of February 25, 1862, was the first measure passed on the subject. The Treasury note provided for by that act was irredeemable, ao time of payment fixed, bearing no interest, and made a legal tender for all debts except two classes. And on recurring to the history of this measure, it will be seen that its friends did not pretend to defend it on any other grounds than as a "forced loan," to be redeemed in coin at the earliest day possible. One distinguished gentleman of that Congress, and who was the leading financial spirit of the House then, is with us yet, [Mr. HOOPER.] He so regarded it, as did Mr. Spaulding, of New York, another leading financier of the House.

It was never intended to make that system perpetual. The Government of the United States has in the most solemn manner pledged itself to the earliest practicable redemption possible of this forced loan, in coin. In less than two weeks after the inauguration of General Grant, in March, 1869, Congress enacted the following law:

> That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the law by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money, or in other currency than gold and silver; but none of the said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time as United States notes shall be convertible into coin, at the option of the holder, or unless at such time as bonds of the United States, bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed, can be sold at par in coin; and the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of United States notes in coin.

Then I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the republican party which assembled at Philadelphia, and renominated General Grant for President, declared in its platform, in reference to the question of specie payments, as follows:

> We witness with pride the reduction of the principal of the debt and of the rate of interest upon the balance, and confidently expect that our excellent national currency will be perfected by a speedy resumption of specie payment.

The liberal republican party at Cincinnati, in the same year, in placing in nomination Mr. Greeley as a candidate for President, declared with still greater emphasis, if possible, its views on this subject. Its platform says:

> A speedy return to specie payment is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government.

The democratic party at Baltimore accepted both the candidate and the declaration of principles of the liberal republicans at Cincinnati; so that all the great political parties of the country are committed in the most solemn manner a party can commit itself to a "speedy"—that is the one word all have used—to a speedy return to specie payments. Shall it be said of the great political parties of the country that their platforms of principles are only resolutions of empty buncombe, intended to mislead and inveigle honest people into their support? The people already are losing faith in the sincerity of these resolutions. Congress has already shown what respect it has for them by attempting to restore the abuse of the franking privilege. Are we going to repeat the disregard we have for our solemn platform pledges, by refusing to shape legislative action in order that a speedy resumption of specie payments may be attained?

More than that, the founder of the system, the "father of our greenback currency," as the phrase used to go, so regarded it. It was this part of his scheme that has given Mr. Chase the reputation at home and abroad of being the greatest statesman of his age. His greatness as a statesman rests mainly upon his administration of our finances during the dark period of our terrible civil war. Naturally enough to a man of ambition, this scheme, which was the cause of his greatness, would be cherished. He would seek all occasions to defend it and make it stand forever on our statute-books as an enduring monument of its author's greatness. And yet, when the storm of battle had swept past, and he was called upon to pass judgment upon this great measure of his, in the light of the Constitution, at a time, too, when its constitutionality had ceased to be questioned by many of the leading men of his own party, he did not hesitate to take up his pen and write across the greatest act of his life, "unconstitutional." In delivering his dissenting opinion in the Legal-tender cases, (12 Wallace, page 583,) he said:

> In considering this question we assume as a fundamental proposition that it is the duty of every government to establish a standard of value. The necessity of a standard is indeed universally acknowledged. Without it the transactions of society would become impossible. All measures, whether of extent, or weight, or value, must have certain proportions of that which they are intended to measure. The unit of extent must have certain definite length, the unit of weight certain definite gravity, and the unit of valne certain definite value. These units, multiplied or subdivided, supply the standards by which all measures are properly made. The selection, therefore, by the common consent of all nations, of gold and silver as the standard of value was natural, or, more correctly speaking, inevitable. For whatever definitions of value political economists may have given, they all agree that gold and silver have more value in proportion to weight and size, and are less subject to loss by wear or abrasion than any other material capable of easy subdivision and impression, and that their value changes less and by slower degrees, through considerable periods of time, than that of any other substance which could be used for the same purpose. And these are qualities indispensable to the convenient use of the standard required. In the construction of the constitutional grant of power to establish a standard of value every presumption is, therefore, against that which would authorize the adoption of any other materials than those sanctioned by universal consent.

This noble conduct on the part of our late Chief Justice will be remembered as long as noble deeds shall be cherished by his countrymen. Had not the membership of the great tribunal over which he presided been tampered with, Mr. Chase's judgment, which was the opinion of the majority of the court as then constituted, would have saved the country from its present embarrassment. This carrying out of the clearly expressed declaration of the Government, of the men who passed our legal-tender acts, and of all the great political parties of the country, will give rest and quiet to the country, which will do more good than anything else next to resumption itself.

Let it become known that the Government has set its face steadily and immovably in the direction of specie payments, and our gold and silver will come out of their hiding-places and become currency again—that is something which flows, as the word means—passing from hand to hand in making exchanges and measuring values. I do not wish to be understood as being hostile to our greenback and national-bank circulation. Give a uniform Treasury-note circulation, redeemable in gold, and we will have, I hesitate not to say, the best currency in the world; a currency that will really be uniform, because based upon gold; one that will correct redundancy by an outflow of coin, and scarcity by an influx of the same.

Mr. Speaker, the attempt is made here in order to carry out this scheme of inflation to array the South and West against the Eastern and Middle States, upon what is called the unequal distribution of banking capital. But I hope this attempt to excite local prejudices will fail; we have had enough of it in the past. Besides the designing men of the Middle States who are trying to carry out a financial hobby by exciting sectional feelings, there is nothing else in it. And I hope the members of this House from the great West and South are too intelligent to be deceived by these men.

This complaint about an unequal distribution of the currency is based upon a great financial fallacy and delusion. As it has been stated, currency seeks its level. It will go, despite all legislation to the contrary, where the demands of trade and commerce invite it. If all the national banks in 1864 had been located in the State of Missouri, for instance, you could not by such a contrivance keep the currency there. As the Mississippi, by the law of gravitation, flows to the Gulf, so would the stream of currency set toward New England, New York, and Philadelphia; it would go there to pay debts, and if required there would remain, and there would be no return current until the quantity required was supplied. Read the words of Benton, uttered forty years ago in the Senate of the United States in answer to a similar complaint against the notes of the old United States Bank. The difficulty with these notes was that they would not stay South and West, as it was desired, and the words of Benton, in the light of history to-day, read like prophecy, and are as applicable to the condition of things to-day as they were in 1837:

We have the experiment of this bank [Bank of the United States] not once but twice made; and each experiment proves the truth of the laws which govern the system. The theory of bank circulation, over an extended territory, is this, that you may put out as many notes as you may in any one place, they will immediately fall into the track of commerce, into the current of trade, into the course of exchange, and follow that current wherever it leads. In these United States the current sets from every part of the interior, and especially from the South and West into the Northeast, into the four commercial cities north of the Potomac—Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston; and all the bank-notes which will pass for money in those places fall into the current which sets in that direction. When there is nothing in the course of trade to bring them back, there is no reflux in that current. It is a trade-wind which blows twelve months in the year in the same direction.—Benton's Thirty Years' View, volume 1, page 451.

Mr. Speaker, this fundamental error in relation to the distribution of currency, entertained by some able and intelligent gentlemen from the West and South, has its origin in the same cause from which springs that other fallacy of "cheap money," by reducing the rates of interest. Archbishop Whately, in his excellent work on logic, says that the foundations of political economy being a few general propositions deduced from observation or from consciousness, and generally admitted as soon as stated, it might have been expected that there would be as little difference of opinion among political economists as among mathematicians; that, being agreed in their premises, they could not differ in their conclusion, but through some error in reasoning so palpable as to be readily detected. And if they had possessed a vocabulary of general terms, as precisely defined as the mathematical, this would probably have been the case. But as the terms of this science are drawn from common discourse, and seldom carefully defined by the writers who employ them, hardly one of them has any settled and invariable meaning, and their ambiguities are perpetually overlooked. Among these terms there are two which the inflationists continually confound, namely, "capital" and "currency."

Capital is that portion of unconsumed produce of past labor expended with a view to future production. Says Mr. Ricardo:

Capital is that part of the wealth of a country which is employed with a view to future production, and may be increased in the same manner as wealth.

Capital consists of food, clothing, tools, raw material, machinery, &c., necessary to give effect to labor.

Money, we have already said, is an instrument of exchange and a standard of value, and consists of coin or paper.

Labor and capital increase the quantity and value of commodities. But money can no more add to their quantity or value than the merchant's yard-stick can add to the quantity or value of the cloth which it measures.

The neglect to observe this distinction has involved us in all this trouble and confusion.

The West and South—especially the South—need capital; and as money is not capital, as I have shown, it is not what is most wanted by them. The late war witnessed the destruction of almost untold millions of property in the South, and the difficulty of their situation has been aggravated by bad government since the close of the war. Their situation is a sad one, and demands our warmest sympathy. But how a further increase of our paper money will aid them, I fail to understand. The currency, if issued, would not stay with them; while an increase of prices would follow, without a corresponding increase of money with which to buy.

The plan that looks to the improvement of the West and South without the application of labor and capital will be like the effort of the man who tried to lift himself over his house by the straps of his boots. Labor, after all, is the true source of wealth, and is so in accordance with divine command, and we cannot escape it by any subterfuge of legislation.

For the same reason that capital is not money, the rate of interest cannot be lowered by increasing its quantity, as is erroneously supposed.

It is not the amount of money circulating in a country which determines the rate of interest. Money is but the representative of value. The effect of a larger or smaller currency is to depress or raise the price of all commodities. What is really the subject which produces interest is not the money, but what it will purchase. No man borrows money to hoard. He borrows it to employ in productive industry. He is willing to pay such an interest as the profits in the business in which he invests it will enable him to pay, and compensate him besides for his risk and trouble. The capitalist who has money to lend is willing to take such a sum as will equal the average rate of profits, less the trouble and risk of employing it in that way. It will be seen that the actual rate depends on the demand for and supply of capital; and its necessary rate—that center about which it oscillates—is the average rate of profit on capital.—Blackstone, book 2, page 486, Sharswood's note.

To illustrate: Owing to the scarcity of currency a merchant requires $100 to effect a certain purchase, on which he pays 6 per cent., his loan costing him six dollars. The currency is increased 20 per cent., and the price of the goods which before he purchased for $100 has increased to $120, and he will now require $120 to make the purchase. Suppose now that, in consequence of the ease produced in the money market by inflation, he can effect the loan at 5 per cent. His loan now costs six dollars—just the same as before. What has the borrower gained in this case by a reduction of interest? Nothing; but the evils resulting from inflation have been incalculable.

Is a resumption of specie payments desirable? And, if so, is it practicable? But few on this floor will contend that it is not desirable. Only two speeches that I have listened to would seem to indicate that a specie basis for our currency would not be desirable. One of them characterizes the resolution pledging the Government to the redemption of our legal-tender notes in coin at the earliest practicable period as a piece of buncombe.

While nearly all desire it, a great many seem to think it impracticable. I do not myself, Mr. Speaker, think that a mere legislative fiat will bring it about. I do not think that there is enough gold in the country to-day to do it with. The late report of the Director of the Mint shows:

The amount of gold and silver deposits and purchases, coins struck, and stamped bars manufactured, during the fiscal year, was as follows:

DEPOSITS.

Gold	$59,937,429 45
Silver	12,317,389 43
Total amount received and operated upon	72,254,818 88

Deducting redeposits, bars made and issued by one institution and deposited at another, the deposits were:

Gold	$57,704,385 88
Silver	9,145,328 43
Total	66,849,714 31

COINAGE.

	Value.
Gold, pieces, 1,824,420	$35,249,337 50
Silver, pieces, 11,774,250	2,945,795 50
Minor coinage, pieces, 18,925,000	494,050 00
Total	38,689,183 00

BARS.

Fine gold	$7,554,956 86
Unparted gold	12,940,659 25
		$20,495,616 11
Fine silver	3,034,259 56
Unparted silver	3,987,654 94
		7,021,914 50
Total gold and silver		27,517,530 61

This certainly would not be enough, with the annual foreign drain upon it. But the repeal of certain laws, and the enactment of others relative to our national banks, which I have indicated, will in two or three years bring us to the desired end. I would so shape legislation as to make our paper money gradually but surely appreciate gold. I would show the people that we had our two kinds of currency, specie and paper, flowing not in diverging but in converging lines, and which by natural movements must meet at some near future, and then mingle and flow together. To do it I will not now advocate any contraction of our present currency, simply because such a proposition cannot pass this House. But I would, in order to insure the end, first, declare that the issue of any portion of the $44,000,000 reserve was illegal, and have it retired and canceled, and fix $356,000,000 as the maximum limit of legal-tenders, to be exceeded under no circumstance; secondly, free coinage.

By throwing the costs of coinage on the depositor, the cost of production to the extent of such charge is increased. The free coinage system of Great Britain has done much to make London the bullion market of the world, and has done much to encourage its export from our own country.

The Director of the Mint, in his annual report, to which I have referred, after stating that the amount of coin in the country is about $140,000,000, goes on and says:

The increase to the stock of coin in this country has been at a very fair rate since the 1st of April last, and the indications are that, although there may be occasional exportations, it will gradually go on until an amount sufficient to enable the country to safely resume specie payments is reached.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the opinion of one of the most competent men in the country, and on this subject. The annual production in this country is about $75,000,000, and is largely on the increase. These changes, taken in connection with the fact that the balance of trade is now in our favor, that no more gold will have to go abroad to settle an unfavorable balance against us, will aid us greatly in the resumption of specie payments. With favorable seasons, freedom from war, our largely increasing commerce, our unbounded resources of field and mine, the products of our mills and manufactories, will bring us to the desired haven of specie payments sooner than many of us dare now believe or hope for.

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the measures that I believe will give us relief and put the business of our country upon a solid basis.

A "cheap currency!" "Cheap money!" What is it, Mr. Speaker? I contend that that currency is the cheapest for the laboring man which, dollar for dollar, will purchase for him the greatest amount of the necessaries of life. A depreciated currency always increases the cost of everything which the laborer has to buy. If money is scarce, he needs less with which to procure the means of living; if it is redundant, he needs more. So, twist the subject as you may, you acquire quantity of currency at the expense of quality, and you get the quality at the expense of quantity. It is like the well-known law of mechanics, where you gain speed at the expense of power and power at the expense of speed. My colleague [Mr. KELLEY] would have both—a "cheap" currency, and at the same time one that is not redundant. This is as impossible of attainment as perpetual motion.

What the laboring man, as well as every other person, needs is an unfluctuating currency; for he is the first to suffer by depreciation, as he is the last to gain by appreciation of currency. On this subject Amasa Walker has well remarked:

For labor there is but one demand, namely, the actual or immediate demand; while for all commodities there may be—and when the spirit of speculation has for any cause been engendered—both an actual and speculative demand. Wages cannot, like flour, be bought up in large quantities and kept for a rise of prices.

It is well known that in our late panics the laboring men and mechanics in our furnaces, rolling-mills, and machine-shops were the first to suffer from a reduction of prices, and they will be the last to enjoy the benefit of a rise.

Webster has well said on this subject:

First, as to the currency of the country. This is at all times a most important political object. A sound currency is an essential and indispensable security for the fruits of industry and honest enterprise. Every man of property or industry, every man who desires to preserve what he honestly possesses, or to obtain what he can honestly earn, has a direct interest in maintaining a safe circulating medium, such a medium as shall be a real and substantial representative of property—not liable to vibrate with opinions, not subject to be blown up or blown down by the breath of speculation, but made stable and secure by its immediate relation to that which the whole world regards as of a permanent value. A disordered currency is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system, and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy; and it fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation. Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community, compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by a depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression, on the virtuous and well-disposed, of a degraded paper currency authorized by law or in any way countenanced by Government.

Mr. Speaker, the best interests of our people are opposed to any increase in the volume of our currency; the honor and plighted faith of the Government condemn it; the experience of the past forbids it; and with all these facts staring us in the face, I do not believe this House will so far forget its duty as to place itself in opposition to them.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. ARMSTRONG, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the bill to create a new Territory out of the north half of Dakota. (See Appendix.)

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PAGE also presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of California, for the discouragement of Chinese immigration; which was read, as follows:

Concurrent resolutions on Chinese immigration.

Whereas the great influx of Chinese into the State of California has proved detrimental to the moral and material well-being of our industrial classes, by forcing on them a competition at wages below the cost of subsistence to men of our own origin, who have families depending on their labor for support and education; and whereas article 5 of the treaty of 1868, between the United States and the Chinese Empire—the former containing forty million inhabitants and the latter nearly four hundred millions—provided that the parties thereto shall impose no obstacle to the emigration of their citizens and subjects from one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents, under which stipulation it is notorious that large numbers of persons, frequently aggregating over one thousand in a single vessel, are brought into the port of San Francisco by companies of associated Chinese capitalists, under contract made in China, to perform labor at low wages for their masters for a series of years within the United States, which contracts are enforced by the edicts of secret tribunals which inflict, in defiance of our laws, cruel and arbitrary punishment; and whereas it is against public policy, and the future welfare of our people, that, under any pretext whatever, encouragement should be given by treaty stipulation, or otherwise, to the immigration, free or involuntary, of a servile laboring element whose low standard of living and morality menaces the communities in which it may reside with pestiferous disease; and whereas Mongolian labor has driven from employment large numbers of our people, by a competition which has been prolific of idleness, vice, and suffering among our people, thereby assisting to fill our jails, poor-houses, and hospitals with unwilling inmates: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their influence to have articles 5 and 6 of our treaty with China modified so as to discourage the further immigration of Chinese to our shores, by appropriate action on the part of the Federal Government.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, at as early a day as possible.

W. IRWIN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.
MORRIS M. ESTEE,
Speaker of the Assembly.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MEHITABEL S. WARREN.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2522) granting a pension to Mehitabel S. Warren; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN KELLY.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2525) for the relief of John Kelly; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. M. E. TWIFORD.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2526) for the relief of Mrs. Mary E. Twiford, of Norfolk, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BERTRAN LEWIS.

Mr. O'NEILL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2527) for the relief of Bertran Lewis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS OF THE LATE WAR.

Mr. CASON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2528) giving land warrants or Treasury certificates to the soldiers and seamen in the late war of the rebellion in the Southern States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK CITY, MARYLAND.

Mr. LOWNDES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2529) for the relief of Frederick City and the banks thereof for losses occasioned by the confederate army on July 9, 1864; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BANNING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2530) to repeal section 317 of an act entitled "An act to consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

A. W. DODGE.

Mr. ST. JOHN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2531) for the relief of A. W. Dodge, late postmaster at Otisville, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF A PATENT.

Mr. ST. JOHN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2532) to authorize the extension of the patent of C. W. Williams for improvement in canal-locks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I now move to suspend the rules, so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same, and pass the same with the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives, in procuring a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and the employment of Frederick Law Olmstead, of New York, in furnishing plans for laying out, improving, and inclosing the same.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported this bill, with an amendment, which will now be read.

The Clerk read the amendment as follows:

Strike out the word "five," before "thousand," and insert the word "three," so as to make the appropriation $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this motion in order during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can the rules be suspended during the morning hour?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I think the gentleman will find that after the call of States is finished it is in order to move to suspend the rules during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the reading of the rule on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules, except during the last ten days of the session, and on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read, unless the call of States and Territories for bills on leave and resolutions has been earlier concluded, when the Speaker may entertain a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is in order within five minutes after the House assembles, if the States have been called through for bills on leave. The bill referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] came from the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, was reported back from that committee with an amendment to reduce the appropriation from $5,000 to $3,000, and was sent to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order. The gentleman from Virginia now moves to suspend the rules, so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now passed with the amendment reported from the committee.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have been requested by some gentlemen to make a brief statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object, unless others can be heard.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I will not take up time, but submit the question to the House.

The question was taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 82, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 125, noes 24.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendments; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 121, noes 27.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: This bill will lead to the expenditure of millions, and I ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being but 14 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill with the amendment passed.

PORTLAND AND LOUISVILLE CANAL.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Commerce desire further time to consider the bill (S. No. 350) to provide for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company. I therefore ask unanimous consent that that bill, now being a special order for this time, be postponed until Monday next, after the morning hour, and made the special order at that time.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the House has never declined to grant such a request of one of its committees. I move that the rules be suspended, in order to make the arrangement I have suggested.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his objection.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Understanding that this request comes from the Committee on Commerce, and not from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not needed. I have moved to suspend the rules to make the order I have indicated.

The question was then taken upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes 12; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. There being no quorum on this last vote, the two gentlemen who have already twice acted as tellers this morning will again act as such.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have withdrawn my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] declines to accept unanimous consent for his proposition. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not detain the House further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman consents to receive unanimous consent for his proposition.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

ADDITIONAL JUDICIAL DISTRICT FOR NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] gave notice some time since of his intention to move to suspend the rules to-day, for the purpose of taking up the bill to prevent the importation of contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. TREMAIN. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to yield to me to submit a proposition to the House to pass a bill to establish an additional judicial district in the State of New York.

Mr. BROMBERG. I will yield for a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. TREMAIN. I desire to make a brief statement to show the necessity for early action on this bill.

Mr. KILLINGER. I object to debate.

Mr. TREMAIN. Then I move to suspend the rules and pass House bill No. 2083 to establish an additional judicial district in the State of New York, and to make further provision in relation to the courts of the United States in said State.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KILLINGER] mean that he will not allow a statement of the necessity for immediate action on this bill?

Mr. KILLINGER. I object to debate on the bill.

Mr. CROOKE. I desire to suggest an amendment, which I think my colleague [Mr. TREMAIN] will accept. The bill proposes to make a fourth district in the State, and to fix the salaries for the judges of all the districts. By accident the word "eastern" has been left out, so that the salaries are fixed for three of the judges only. I propose to amend by inserting the words "of said eastern," after the words "of said southern," in the second section of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this bill increase the salaries of the judges?

Mr. CROOKE. It does. The present salary is $3,500 a year, and this bill proposes to fix it at $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will not set such an example as this.

Mr. TREMAIN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. DEWITT. I desire to suggest an amendment to the second section of this bill. It is to insert the words "including the county of Greene, and" after the words "State of New York," in the first line of the second section; also to insert in parentheses after the word "southern," in the second line, the words "excepting the said county of Greene;" so that that portion of the section will read:

SEC. 2. That the residue of the said State of New York, including the county of Greene, not embraced in the eastern or in the southern (excepting the said county of Greene) or western districts is hereby created, and shall hereafter constitute, a new and separate judicial district, to be called the northern district of New York, &c.

The effect of the amendment I propose is to transfer the county of Greene from the southern district to the northern district of New York.

Mr. TREMAIN. I accept the amendment of my colleague. Will the gentleman permit a letter from the late Judge Hall to be read, showing the necessity for this bill?

Mr. CONGER. Not unless debate is allowed.

Mr. TREMAIN. I move, then, to suspend the rules and pass the bill as modified by the amendment I have accepted.

The question being on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker directed that the question be taken by tellers, and appointed Mr. TREMAIN and Mr. CONGER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 56, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

Mr. TREMAIN. I am willing that the provision with reference to the increase of judges' salaries shall be struck out of the bill. With that modification I renew the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill, as modified, be read.

The SPEAKER. The provision in regard to salaries, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] now strikes out, will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the judge of said northern, and of said southern, and of said eastern, and of said western, district, shall each have and receive an annual salary of $5,000, to be paid quarterly, as the salaries of the district judges are paid.

The SPEAKER. The bill, as now modified, proposes simply to establish a new judicial district, the judge to receive the same salary as the judges of the existing districts.

Mr. TREMAIN. That is, $3,500.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Does not the bill, even in its modified form, involve the same principle?

The SPEAKER. What principle?

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Does it not still propose an expenditure of public money?

Mr. TREMAIN. The bill has already been referred to the Committee of the Whole. We now propose to take it out of the committee and pass it.

The SPEAKER. The rule requiring bills making appropriations of money or public property to go to the Committee of the Whole cannot preclude a motion to suspend the rules and pass a bill without such a reference.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask consent that a letter which I received from Judge Hall before his death, and which contains information that ought to be in possession of the House, may be read.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the only effect of the bill in its modified form is to create a fourth judicial district in the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. That is the only effect. The salary of the new judge is to be the same as that of the other judges.

The question being on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker directed that the question be taken by tellers, and appointed Mr. TREMAIN and Mr. KILLINGER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 56, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. BROMBERG. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STANARD] wishes to submit a motion to suspend the rules, that a temporary appropriation may be made for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi. As I understand there will be no discussion upon the question, I yield to the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. STANARD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. No. 2451) to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The bill was read. It appropriates, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War at the mouth of the Mississippi River; said sum to be available from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. STANARD. Mr. Speaker, the appropriation embraced in this bill is simply in anticipation of the regular annual appropriation which would doubtless be made by Congress later in the session. The object is to enable the engineers to have a sufficient amount of money to continue the work from this time until July, the appropriation already made having been exhausted about the first of the present month. That the matter may be officially before the House, if it is desired, I have in my hand two letters, one from Major Howell, the engineer in charge of the work at the mouth of the river, and the other from the Secretary of War.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, the motion was seconded.

The motion to suspend the rules was then agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE EASTERN BRANCH OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. ELDREDGE, by unanimous consent, presented a report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to accompany the bill (H. R. No. 775) to authorize the construction of a substantial iron or masonry bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac at or near the present Anacostia Bridge; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

TAXATION.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2533) to increase the taxation on foreign products, and to reduce internal-revenue taxation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

CINCINNATI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Merchants' Exchange, March 13, 1874.

At a regular session of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, held this day, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the bill now pending before Congress, providing for the purchase of the Louisville and Portland Canal, will come up for final action in the House of Representatives on Monday next, which bill authorizes the Secretary of War to take possession of said canal within thirty days after the passage of the bill; and whereas a measure of such vital importance to the commerce and navigation of the western and southern waters demands at the hands of this chamber an expression as to the wishes of the mercantile interests of this city:

"Resolved, That this chamber respectfully requests our Representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to secure the passage of said bill, as it is now before the House of Representatives, at the earliest practicable period; and the president of this chamber is hereby instructed to telegraph the spirit of this preamble and resolution to Messrs. SAYLER and BANNING, our Representatives in Congress."

S. F. COVINGTON,
President.

S. V. REID, Secretary pro tempore.

ACCOUNTS OF MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to furnish to this House a list of the mail contractors whose accounts for carrying the mails for the quarter ending December 31, 1873, were reported by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury to the Post-Office Department for payment between December 30, 1873, and January 6, 1874, and paid prior to January 10, 1874; giving the amount reported to be due each contractor; the number of the reports and of the mail-routes so reported; also in whose favor drafts or warrants were issued in settlement of said accounts.

ARKANSAS VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad a bill (H. R. No. 2534) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Arkansas Valley Railway Company; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

PREVENTION OF CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will now state his motion.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up for consideration in the House a bill (H. R. No. 1584) to prevent the importation of contagious and infectious diseases into the United States.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Does not the point of order lie against the bill that it involves an appropriation, and must therefore have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Is the proposition to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. BROMBERG. No, Mr. Speaker; I do not propose to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules. My motion is to suspend the rules so as to consider it in the House.

Mr. COX. I do not know that I would object if we had ample time for the consideration of the bill. There is no more important bill before this Congress. It tears up all the quarantine laws of the State. I hope it will be considered; certainly it ought not to be passed without consideration. It ought not to be considered to-day, but should be made a special order for some other time.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope we will have the bill read, so that the House may know what it is.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman propose to have the bill considered immediately, or to have its consideration fixed for some future day?

Mr. BROMBERG. I desire to have it considered immediately, and for the reason I have already stated on another occasion. The purpose of the bill demands prompt action. No more important bill can come before the House than this, and if its passage be delayed its whole purpose will be lost for an entire year. We are now threatened all along our coast with the importation of contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Is not the bill open to the point of order, that it must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules for the purpose of bringing the bill before the House for consideration, and that motion is in order, as well as the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. BROMBERG. Mr. Speaker, I desired to have this bill set for another day, but found special orders already made to such an extent that it would be months before we could get it up, and therefore gave notice I would move to suspend the rules to-day to consider and pass the bill at this time. I gave notice a week ago I would propose to take up the bill for consideration on Monday, which day was not set apart for any other purpose.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. But it was not agreed to take it up to-day.

Mr. COX. I am interested in this bill, and hope the House will allow me to be heard on it.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move the rules be suspended, and the bill be taken up for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. ELDREDGE. As I understand it the motion of the gentleman from Alabama now is that the rules be suspended to take up the bill for consideration. There is some doubt about what is meant by the gentleman in proposing to bring this bill up for consideration. If the bill is open to debate and consideration in that way, then I understand there will be no objection to his motion; but is that the meaning of the motion?

The SPEAKER. If the motion of the gentleman from Alabama prevails, it will bring the bill before the House for consideration, and if it be not finished to-day, it will go over as unfinished business, and come up to-morrow morning.

Mr. BROMBERG. I call attention to the fact that I gave notice of this motion some time ago.

The SPEAKER. If it be taken up it will consume the rest of this day, and so long as the House may see fit to debate it hereafter.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does the gentleman from Alabama propose to allow amendments to be offered to his bill?

Mr. BROMBERG. It strikes me that if the House proceeds to discuss it, the House will take what course it may deem fit in reference to the disposition of the proposition.

Mr. COX. It ought to be amended in many ways. It concerns every State in the Union.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. There are other matters of importance before the House, which can only be considered on Monday.

Mr. COX. If we take it up to-day then we cannot tell when we will get rid of it.

The SPEAKER. Of course, if the bill be taken up for consideration to-day, it would go forward, crushing out the morning hour of each succeeding day until it is disposed of.

Mr. BROMBERG. I call for a vote on my motion.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. COX and Mr. BROMBERG tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 64.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the suspension of the rules to take the bill up for consideration at once.

Mr. BROMBERG. I have asked for the reading of the bill, but if that be not desired I will not insist on it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I make that motion.

Several MEMBERS. O, no; withdraw your motion.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BROMBERG. I insist on a vote on my motion to suspend the rules and bring the bill before the House for consideration.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 59; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. MELLISH and Mr. LAMAR tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Mr. BROMBERG. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that there seems to be considerable difference of opinion in the House on this bill, as there was in the committee. Several gentlemen propose to offer amendments to it, and I suggest whether it would not further the object of the gentleman if amendments be offered and ordered to be printed, and some future day be set apart for the consideration of this measure?

Mr. BROMBERG. That certainly would accord with my own intentions, and what I tried to do two weeks ago, when I stated that it was important that there should be an immediate and early consideration of this bill. I am willing to do anything that will secure that object.

Mr. CONGER. I think some conclusion should be come to by the House as to when the bill should come up.

Mr. COX. This bill should never have come from the committee at all.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] any further proposition to make in regard to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. NEGLEY. I would suggest that it should be set down for consideration three weeks hence.

Mr. BROMBERG. That would be too late.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then say two weeks. I would suggest that this day two weeks be designated for the consideration of the bill. I am satisfied that the House does not now understand it.

Mr. BROMBERG. If it should be made a special order for a week from to-morrow, would it be shut out by any other special orders?

Mr. MAYNARD. It cannot take precedence of other special orders already fixed.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move that the rules be suspended to make this bill a special order two weeks from to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if that order were made the bill would not be reached then, and for this reason: There are two special orders, the one the transportation bill and the other the currency bill, to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has just referred, both of which are special orders, under a suspension of the rules, at half-past one o'clock. A subsequent suspension of the rules would have no more force than these special orders already existing, and of course would be after them in point of time.

Mr. COX. There has been a remark made here in the nature of debate, that there is urgency for this bill. There are laws now existing in the States on the subject; and this would override all the laws now existing.

Mr. BROMBERG. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The only mode in which the gentleman can escape the necessity of a two-thirds vote on the bill is by having it regularly reported from the Committee on Commerce on the call of that committee. When the committee is called regularly it can report this bill if it chooses; otherwise there is no other process by which it can be brought before the House for consideration except by a two-thirds vote, which will suspend the rules.

Mr. BROMBERG. This has been reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. When? On a call of the committee?

Mr. BROMBERG. Not on a call of the committee.

The SPEAKER. If it were reported on a call of the committee it would be before the House.

Mr. BROMBERG. Would it be then subject to the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Does the bill contain an appropriation of money?

Mr. HOLMAN. It provides for the payment of expenses.

Mr. BROMBERG. Provision is made in the sixth section for temporary clerks.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. It would also be capable of amendment so as to provide for extra compensation for the members of the board.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the Speaker look at the sixth section of the bill?

Mr. COX. Does that question come up now?

The SPEAKER. The question having been suggested, the Chair was about to answer it hypothetically. The bill the Chair thinks would, as drawn, be amenable to the point of order, and would necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COX. I propose to reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. It is not apposite now, because the proposition is for a suspension of the rules. But if the bill were regularly reported from a committee, it would then be open to the point of order that it requires an appropriation of money.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to suspend the rules, so as to make the bill a special order a week from to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not promote his object by that motion, for on Monday next the gentleman from Indiana has precedence for the bill in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal; and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama to make his motion immediately after the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is disposed of.

Mr. BROMBERG. My only object is to have a day set when we shall have the bill discussed and disposed of. I think the House will agree that the bill ought to be discussed, whatever views gentlemen may entertain in regard to its particular provisions.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. The bill is on the General Calendar. Why does the gentleman not allow it to come up in its regular order?

Mr. BROMBERG. Because the yellow-fever season is approaching rapidly.

Mr. COX. I object to debate. The bill will tear up two million dollars already invested in New York in quarantine buildings.

Mr. BROMBERG. I will discuss the question with the gentleman when the bill comes up. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the bill be set as a special order for two weeks from to-day, after the morning hour.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope no arrangement will be made that will prolong the discussion of this bill day after day. For four weeks the Committee on Appropriations have been waiting to forward their business. Now, if this bill can be set for one day, and finished on that day, I, for one, will not object; but if it is going to occupy a whole week, and thereby delay the business of the Committee on Appropriations, and other important business, then I am opposed to it. If the bill is to be open for discussion and amendment, it is likely to take up at least a week.

Mr. BROMBERG. I think not. I shall attempt to pass the bill in its present form, because it has been well considered and matured in the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that the rules be suspended, and this bill made the special order for this day fortnight, after the morning hour.

Mr. MAYNARD. What will be the effect of that motion if it prevails?

The SPEAKER. It will cut out all other motions to suspend the rules on that day.

Mr. MAYNARD. And will it not go over until the following Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; it will go over until the next day, and cut out the morning hour of that and all succeeding days until it is disposed of; but it will not interfere with the assignments for half-past one o'clock which were made under a suspension of the rules.

Tellers were ordered on seconding Mr. BROMBERG's motion, and Mr. COX and Mr. BROMBERG were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 33; no quorum voting.

Mr. BROMBERG. I call for the yeas and nays on the second.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays cannot be called on the second, and there being no quorum voting, the Chair will entertain no motion except for a call of the House or to adjourn.

Mr. KILLINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order if the House refuses to adjourn.

The question was put on Mr. KILLINGER's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 72, noes 48.

Mr. HYNES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 105, not voting 108; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Burchard, Clymer, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Danford, DeWitt, Eden, Eldredge, Frye, Glover, Hamilton, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Hoskins, Houghton, Kasson, Kelley, Killinger, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Magee, McJunkin, McKee, Monroe, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Poland, William R. Roberts, Sawyer, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheats, Sloss, Smart, John Q. Smith, St. John, Stone, Storm, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Tyner, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, William Williams, and Wolfe—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Arthur, Barry, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Buffinton, Burrows, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Curtis, Davis, Dobbins, Dunnell, Durham, Field, Fort, Garfield, Giddings, Gunckel, Hagans, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hendee, Herndon, Hodges, Holman, Howe, Hunter, Hyde, Hynes, Kendall, Lamport, Lawson, Loughridge, Luttrell, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McLean, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Neal, Negley, O'Brien, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Read, Rice, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, Sessions, Sherwood, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Standeford, Starkweather, Townsend, Vance, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whiteley, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodford, and Woodworth—105.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Berry, Brown, Bundy, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Creamer, Crocker, Crutchfield, Darrall, Dawes, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Elliott, Farwell, Foster, Freeman, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Havens, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Hubbell, Hunton, Hurlbut, Jewett, Kellogg, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Lewis, Lowe, Maynard, MacDougall, McNulta, Mills, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, Phelps, Pierce, Potter, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Rawls, Ray, Richmond, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Stephens, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Waldron, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Whitehouse, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—108.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the roll-call,

Mr. CROSSLAND said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is detained from the House by sickness, and that my colleague, Mr. BROWN, has been called home by sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The tellers, Mr. COX and Mr. BROMBERG, then resumed their places.

The House again divided on seconding Mr. BROMBERG's motion to suspend the rules; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 23; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, no motion is in order but for a call of the House or to adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HYNES. After the motion to adjourn has just been defeated, and no other motion submitted, is any motion but for a call of the House in order?

The SPEAKER. A vote has been taken since the motion to adjourn was defeated. The business of the House cannot be conducted by the Chair; it requires concurrence of the members, which the members to-day refuse to give. The rules require that if the House finds itself without a quorum, the Chair shall entertain but two motions, one to adjourn, and the other for a call of the House. The Chair will adhere strictly to the rules.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 83, noes 56.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 97; not one-fifth in the affirmative.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SENER called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered, there being in the affirmative 29, one-fifth of a quorum; and Mr. FRYE and Mr. SENER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 31, noes 117.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NEGLEY. I propose to the House to agree——

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order; nothing is in order but to vote on the motion to adjourn.

The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 77, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS — Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barry, Bell, Bland, Bright, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Cain, Cannon, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Frye, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hagans, Hamilton, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Young—99.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BOWEN. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is absent on account of ill health.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. DONNAN, has been called away from the city to attend the funeral of his father.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn, the Chair will receive bills for reference only, as there are some gentlemen who have not had the opportunity to present them.

IRA FOSTER.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No 2532) granting a pension to Ira Foster, late a private in the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and ordered to be printed.

FORT HARKER MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2533) to donate a portion of the military reservation at Fort Harker to the State of Kansas for the establishment of a normal school, and to open the remainder of said reservation for settlement; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPORTATION OF SHIP-MATERIALS.

Mr. BURLEIGH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2534) to import ship-materials free of duty; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SAINT CECILIA ACADEMY, TENNESSEE.

Mr. HARRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2535) for the relief of Saint Cecilia Academy, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JOHN W. DUFF.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2536) for the relief of the heirs of John W. Duff; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GAYLE H. KYLE.

Mr. SNYDER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2537) for the relief of the widow and children of Gayle H. Kyle; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PONTON BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Claims a bill (H. R. No. 2538) to legalize and establish a ponton railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

COLUMBUS, FAYETTE AND DECATUR RAILROAD.

Mr. HERNDON, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2077) authorizing the Columbus, Fayette and Decatur Railroad Company, of Alabama and Mississippi, to purchase public lands; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 2539) relinquishing the right of the United States in certain lands in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent that there may be a session of the House this evening, at half-past seven o'clock, to be devoted exclusively to debate, no business whatever to be transacted.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection to this proposition, the motion to adjourn which has prevailed will be construed as a motion for a recess till half-past seven o'clock this evening.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CURTIS, will act as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session.

PRINTING OF MOIETY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to ask that they may be authorized to have printed, for the use of the committee and other members of the House, the testimony taken by the committee upon the question of the modification of the law in regard to moieties to informers, &c.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order to print will be made.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The vote upon the motion of Mr. ELDREDGE was then announced; and (at half-past three o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess till half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. CURTIS in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets to-night for debate only, and the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States is before the House.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, all winter long industrious and willing mechanics, artisans, and laborers—the best and the most useful of society—starving and miserably perishing for want of food, on the streets and in the garrets of our proudest and wealthiest city, have been reading from day to day that corn is burned for fuel in the farm-houses of Iowa. Those farm-houses are heavily mortgaged, and their indwellers, with the products of the most fruitful soil piled high around them, lack the necessaries that should be found in every well-ordered and comfortable American home.

While, sir, I am fully impressed with the difficulties that surround any practical solution of the transportation problem, as it is presented to us, I am still firm in the belief that, where such evils and abuses have grown up, as unquestionably exist, there is, and there must be, some adequate remedy—a remedy that shall meet the evils complained of, and that shall be just to all.

As a first step in the reform needed, I believe that the bill under consideration is, with some amendments in its details, the best measure that has been presented. It is not to be reasonably expected that any law upon a subject like this, so new and untried, comparatively, in the legislation of this country, will be perfect at the outset in all its parts. But every one who has given this question any attention at all must be convinced that some legislation for the regulation of interstate railroads must be attempted. The evils that oppress the people, from the management of such railroads, have become too pressing and too clamorous to be disregarded. I take it, sir, that no one here will have the hardihood to treat lightly the complaints that come to us from all quarters of the country.

When gentlemen remember that last year three hundred and fifty million bushels of grain, raised in the Mississippi Valley, were transported by railroad to the Atlantic slope, and that the average freight charge thereon was fifty cents per bushel; and when it is known that the actual cost of such transportation from the Mississippi River to New York need not exceed thirteen cents per bushel, there must be a wrong somewhere that should be righted. How shall it be done? This is the question that is presented to us, and will not be evaded.

The growth of railroads, and of the powerful influences surrounding them, has been far in advance of all legislation for their regulation or control. Railroads are singularly the result of the newest of modern civilization. It is vain, therefore, to search for precedents in the legislation of this or of older countries. Other governments are perplexed equally with our own in attempting to deal with the question. In continental Europe many of the railroads are owned and operated by the states. In England, and with us, they are owned by corporations. The former system, whatever its advantages, seems repugnant to the temper of the American people, and to the spirit of American institutions. That system, right or wrong, is not likely soon to meet with favor here.

Regulation, not ownership, of interstate railroads is the province of the Federal Government. There are strong arguments in favor of State ownership of railroads entirely within the limits of such State. But I doubt if there be any considerable weight of opinion favorable to ownership by the General Government of a line of railway.

There are two things to be considered: the constitutional power of Congress to enact a law like that contemplated in this bill; and then, if such power exists, whether such a law is expedient and will accomplish the purpose desired.

The class of railroads referred to in the bill are interstate railroads. The third clause of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution, provides that Congress shall have power—

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The very able report accompanying this bill, and the exhaustive speech delivered here a few days ago by the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, [Mr. MCCRARY,] leave little to be added in defense of the position that Congress has full power under the Constitution to regulate interstate commerce carried on by railroads. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States bearing upon this question are numerous, and have been well summarized in that report, and in that speech to which we have listened with admiration and pleasure. The case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton, 1,) arising in 1824, is familiar to every lawyer. Latterly, the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge Company, should be noticed. The decision in this case, delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, is conclusive; and I shall be pardoned if I quote it again in this discussion. That opinion contains the following language:

> Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce, because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce as well as when carried on by water, and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in the one case as in the other. The "commerce among the States," spoken of in the Constitution, must, at the time that instrument was adopted, have been mainly of this character, for the steamboat, which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers, was then unknown.
> Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted, a means by which merchandise is transported across the States and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has, with great benefit, been subject to the control of salutary congressional legislation, because it is an instrument of commerce. Is there any reason why the other should not? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that where these roads become parts of great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States; and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government.
> As already intimated, the shackles with which the different States fettered commerce in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates, was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present Constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce, since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the Federal Government, has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of that commerce again to the control of the States, and to the consequent vexations and burdens which the States may impose through whose territories it must be carried on? And must all this be permitted because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the Constitution was framed?
> For myself, I must say, that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads, when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] while compelled to recognize the force of this authority in its bearing upon the discussion, says:

> Now, what does the court evidently mean by proper regulations? Why, it could mean only such regulations as lie within the extent and objects of the grant. As to the objects, they were of the class comprehended in the safety, equality, and freedom of commerce, imperiled and fettered under the Confederation. As to the extent, it is found in the examples in the statutes for the regulation of commerce on steamboats. These were definite and tangible illustrations of the meaning of the court. The objects furnish no authority to this bill. The examples limiting the extent furnish none, because the statutes regulating steamboat commerce leave the carriers free to fix their own price, fare, and freight. And not the remotest intimation is given by the court that the power to regulate embraces in its objects or extent the subject of tolls, fare, or freight; and the court excludes any such conclusion by instancing the regulations of steamboat commerce as of the nature and extent of what is meant by the phrase "proper regulations."

I reply that it is true the learned justice, in his opinion, did not particularly instance, by way of illustration, the regulation of rates of fare and freight; yet it is easy to see that fixing these rates may, in the growth of commerce, become regulations quite as "proper," and quite as necessary, as laws regulating the construction of steamboats, limiting the number of passengers they shall carry, and specifying the signals they shall use in passing each other. The right to do all these things depends wholly upon the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce, and has never been questioned. Now, the right to protect shippers and passengers from extortionate tolls may be quite as "proper," may be quite as important and necessary, under a variety of exigencies in the regulation of commerce, as the construction and equipment of the vehicle by which such commerce is carried on..

The Northwestern Railroad extends from Chicago, in Illinois, to Omaha, in Nebraska, crossing the State of Iowa. Suppose that by an unequal schedule of rates all freight from Omaha or from Chicago, destined for towns along the road in Iowa, should be charged so high as to amount to a prohibition of their transit. Cannot the gentleman conceive that this would be a "proper" subject for "regulation" by Congress? The Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroad extends from Omaha to San Francisco, running through the States of Nebraska, Nevada, and California, and the Territories of Utah and Wyoming. Suppose freight from the East or the West, and destined for the interior of Nevada, should be charged such tolls as to utterly prostrate and ruin the local traffic of that State, while enriching and building up at our expense great marts of trade at either terminus. Could not such extortion and discrimination be properly regulated? But precisely such is the condition of interstate commerce along this road. This I shall presently show.

As pertinent here, I quote the canon of constitutional interpretation laid down by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden. I commend it to the consideration of my excellent friend from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR:]

> This instrument [the Constitution] contains an enumeration of powers expressly granted by the people to their Government. It has been said that these powers should be strictly construed. But why ought they to be so construed? Is there one sentence in the Constitution which gives countenance to this rule? In the last of the enumerated powers, that which grants expressly the means for carrying all others into execution, Congress is authorized to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for the purpose. But this limitation on the means which may be used is not extended to the powers which are conferred; nor is there one sentence in the Constitution which has been pointed out by the gentlemen of the bar, or which we have been able to discover, that prescribes this rule. We do not, therefore, think ourselves justified in adopting it.

And again, further on in the opinion in this same case:

> Powerful and ingenious minds, taking as postulates that the powers expressly granted to the Government of the Union are to be contracted by construction into the narrowest possible compass, and that the original powers of the States are retained, if any possible construction will retain them, may, by a course of well-digested but refined and metaphysical reasoning, founded on these premises, explain away the Constitution of our country, and leave it a magnificent structure indeed to look at, but totally unfit for use.

It has been said—invoking the maxim, delegatus non potest delegare—that this bill proposes an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power by Congress to the board of railroad commissioners, who are empowered to fix the maximum rate of charges for transportation, &c.

As relevant to this objection I shall quote the very full discussion of the question in the opinion of the supreme court of Illinois, deciding the case of People vs. Reynolds, (5 Gilman, 1.)

The General Assembly had passed a law providing for a division of the county of Gallatin and the formation of a new county from a part of the same territory, the act to take effect upon a majority vote in favor of such division. It was argued that this was a delegation of legislative power; that the statute referred to was merely a proposition or bill submitted to the people of Gallatin County, to be by them passed into a law or defeated at the polls. The court, holding the statute to be constitutional, say:

> To the General Assembly have the people delegated the legislative powers of the government, only limited and controlled by the Federal and State constitutions, and it is insisted that these powers cannot be delegated to any body of men or any portion of the people, upon the principle that delegated powers cannot be delegated. This maxim is true, unless the delegate is empowered to employ others. The extent to which this maxim should be applied to a legislator depends upon a proper understanding of legislative powers; upon a proper determination of what may be legitimately done in the exercise of those powers. It is easy to say that it is the business of the Legislature to make laws; but then we must inquire, what kind of laws may be made; must they be full, complete, perfect, absolute, depending upon no contingency and conferring no discretion? This would be absolute legislation, exhausting legislative power on the subject-matter of the law. We presume that nowhere has constitutional learning advanced so far as to assert this doctrine.

* * * * * * *

If the saying be true that the Legislature cannot delegate its powers, it is only so in its most general sense. We may well admit that the Legislature cannot delegate its general legislative authority; still it may authorize many things to be done by others which it might properly do itself. All power possessed by the Legislature is delegated to it by the people, and yet few will be found to insist that whatever the Legislature may do, it shall do, or else it shall go undone. To establish such a principle in a large State would be almost to destroy the Government. The Legislature may grant ferry licenses, or it may lay out roads and specify their metes and bounds, and yet who will doubt that it may delegate this power to others, either by general or special laws? So, also, it may pass all the laws requisite for the government of a particular city, or township, or school district; and who will doubt the propriety of its authorizing this to be done by the people within the city, town, or district, by their local representatives, or even directly?

This is making laws, and laws, too, of as binding efficacy as if passed directly by the Legislature. They are dependent upon the Legislature for their vitality and force; through the act of incorporation, or law under or by virtue of which they are made. Necessarily regarding many things especially affecting local or individual interests the Legislature may act either mediately or immediately. We see, then, that while the Legislature may not divest itself of its proper functions, or delegate its general legislative authority, it may still authorize others to do those things which it might properly, yet cannot understandingly or advantageously do itself. Without this power legislation would become oppressive, and yet imbecile. Local laws almost universally call into action, to a greater or less extent, the agency and discretion either of the people or individuals to accomplish in detail what is authorized or required in general terms. The object to be accomplished, or the thing permitted, may be specified, and the rest left to the agency of others, with better opportunities of accomplishing the object, or doing the thing understandingly.

It has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] with a sharpness of illustration, that Congress might as well fix the price of cotton and tobacco as the tolls over a railroad. But let him consider that from time immemorial governments have fixed the price of money by usury laws. Our own Federal Government has delegated authority to many private corporations to fix tolls upon public highways. Our State governments have delegated authority to municipal corporations which, in many instances, have regulated by ordinance the minute affairs of business among citizens; the maximum charges allowed to draymen and hackmen; the price of water and gas, the rate of tolls on street cars, and over bridges or ferries; the rate of speed at which you may drive along the street.

Again, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Olcott vs. The Supervisors, (16 Wallace, 678,) declare:

That railroads, though constructed by private corporations, and owned by them, are public highways, has been the doctrine of nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. * * * The railroad can therefore be controlled by the State. Its use can be defined; its tolls and rates for transportation may be limited.

And the committee in their report, already referred to, drew from this the obvious conclusion that since Congress may make any regulation concerning commerce among the States, which the State can make concerning that which is completely internal, it follows that since the latter may be regulated by limiting tolls and rates for transportation, so may the former. It would, indeed, be a strange anomaly if a line of railroad operating in but one State, and engaged in local commerce only, should be held subject to legislative control in respect to its charges, while a great through line, crossing the territory of many States, and largely engaged in commerce among them, capable of becoming, if uncontrolled, a vast and dangerous monopoly, should be held free from such control; and yet such is the inevitable consequence of a denial of the power of Congress to limit charges upon interstate lines, while granting to the States power to limit such charges upon lines within their borders.

Besides, railway companies are common carriers, and, as such, are bound to transport passengers and freight at reasonable rates. This principle of law is too familiar to require argument or authority in its support.

The case of Veazie et al. vs. Moore, (14 Howard, 571,) is quoted in the very able argument of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] and has been claimed as decisive authority against this bill. But let us recur again to the facts of that case, and by those facts read the opinion of the court. A brief statement of the case is this:

The defendant in error had derived certain rights to the exclusive navigation of a portion of the Penobscot River, which is wholly within the State of Maine. Those rights had been obtained by legislative act of that State. Plaintiffs in error had done certain things interfering with these rights, and by decree of the supreme judicial court were perpetually enjoined. And this is what the Supreme Court say:

Upon a comparison of this decree, and of the statute upon which it is founded, with the provision of the Constitution already referred to, we are unable to perceive by what rule of interpretation either the statute or the decree can be brought within either of the categories comprised in that provision.

These categories are—

First. Commerce with foreign nations.

Secondly. Commerce among the several States.

Thirdly. Commerce with the Indian tribes.

Taking the term "commerce" in its broadest acceptation, supposing it to embrace not merely traffic, but the means and vehicles by which it is prosecuted, can it properly be made to include objects and purposes such as those contemplated by the law under review? Commerce with foreign nations must signify commerce which in some sense is necessarily connected with these nations, transactions which either immediately, or at some stage of their progress, must be extra-territorial. The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal between citizens of the same community, or to a polity and laws whose ends and purposes and operations are restricted to the territory and soil and jurisdiction of such community.

Nor can it be properly concluded that, because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce, that the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase foreign commerce, or fairly implied in any investiture of the power to regulate such commerce. A pretension as far-reaching as this would extend to contracts between citizen and citizen of the same State, would control the pursuits of the planter, the grazier, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the immense operations of the collieries, and mines, and furnaces of the country, for there is not one of these avocations, the result of which may not become the subjects of foreign commerce, and be borne either by turnpikes, canals, or railroads, from point to point within the several States, toward an ultimate destination, like the one above mentioned. Such a pretension would effectually prevent or paralyze every effort at internal improvement by the several States, for it cannot be supposed that the States would exhaust their capital and their credit in the construction of turnpikes, canals, and railroads, the remuneration derivable from which, and all control over which, might be immediately wrested from them, because such public works would be facilities for a commerce which, while availing itself of those facilities, was unquestionably internal, although intermediately or ultimately it become foreign.

There is, I submit, sir, not one word in this decision or in the facts of the case referring to interstate commerce. The court say, in terms, that neither the statute nor the decree comes within the provisions of the Constitution referred to, to regulate commerce among the States. Here was State commerce exclusively, and the court say that the constitutional provision to regulate commerce among the States is not trenched upon by either the Legislature or the decree of the court of Maine. And that is all there is of this authority as applicable in this discussion.

But in the case of interstate railroads, chartered and subsidized by the Government of the United States, how much stronger is the argument in favor of this constitutional power of Congress! Indeed, no argument is needed. In many instances the right of Congress to regulate the rates of transportation is expressly reserved in the charters granted. Such provisions exist in the acts of Congress authorizing the construction of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads.

The act of July 1, 1862, incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and made applicable in its provisions to the Central Pacific Railroad Company—a corporation previously existing under the laws of the State of California—contains the following section:

SEC. 18. That whenever it appears that the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs, and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road, shall exceed 10 per cent. upon its cost, exclusive of the 5 per cent. to be paid to the United States, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon, if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law. And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendatory act of July 2, 1864, also provides:

SEC. 22. That Congress may, at any time, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

So, clearly, in the case of these companies, is the right expressly reserved by Congress to regulate at any time the charges for transportation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at this point in the discussion I wish to speak specifically of the oppressions and extortions practiced by one of these railroad companies—the Central Pacific—upon the people with whom my lot is cast, and whose interests I mean faithfully to represent. I certainly have no feeling of hostility, personal or otherwise, toward this great corporation, or any single officer or member thereof. To me they are, all and singular, an impersonality, known only as the management of the vast interests under their control cripples and injuriously affects the people of my State.

It can scarcely be necessary to refer to the fact that this road has been built, literally and in fact, by the Government. Not only this, but also in the building of the road a large number of individuals have been enormously enriched—how, I will not stop here to inquire. The investigation into the operations of the Contract and Finance Company may show. I leave that task to others. Let us see, briefly, what the Government—the people—has done for this railroad, which runs through the entire State of Nevada, from east to west; and then let us see what the railroad has done and is doing for the people.

The subsidy for the main line, from Sacramento to Ogden, a distance of 743 miles, was as follows: For that portion between Sacramento and the base of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, 7.18 miles, at the rate of $16,000 per mile, amounting to $114,880; for the succeeding distance of 150 miles, through the Sierras, at the rate of $48,000 per mile, amounting to $7,200,000; and for the remaining distance, 585.82 miles, from the eastern base of the Sierras (and for the most part over level plains) to Ogden, at the rate of $32,000 per mile, amounting to $18,061,120, making a total of $26,061,120, or an average of $35,076 per mile.

In addition to this the company was authorized to issue its first-mortgage bonds for a sum equal to this Government subsidy—the lien of the Government being a second mortgage. So that for this distance of 743 miles the aid rendered to the company, in money, by the Government, was at the rate of $70,152 per mile, amounting to a total of $52,122,240.

The total length of the Central Pacific Railroad, including its branches, is 1,222 miles, and the total amount of Government bonds loaned to it is $27,855,680, with the right to issue its own first-mortgage bonds for a like amount. But I have preferred, as best illustrating my argument, to speak more specifically of the main line just mentioned from Sacramento to Ogden.

Now, it would seem that a money subsidy of $70,152 per mile, whether you consider that it shall be eventually a loan or a gift, would have been an ample inducement for the construction of a railroad running for the most part over open and level plains affording a natural grade. But in addition, there was the grant—the absolute donation—of ten alternate sections of land on each side of the road, equal to 12,800 acres per mile. Some of these timber lands extending through the Sierras, clothed with the finest forests in the world, are of immense value. But rating them at an average of only $2.50 per acre, they amount to $32,000 per mile. This company, therefore, has received from the Government, in various ways, a total of at least $102,152 per mile of road constructed. And all this magnificent subsidy comes from the people. Have not the people, then, some rights of travel and traffic over this road which its management is bound to respect?

Next, sir, I call your attention to the income derived by this company. I refer now to the entire road and its branches; and its general balance-sheet for 1872 is shown as follows:

Kind.	Gross earnings.	Operating expenses.	Net earnings.
Coin	$7,400,089 35	$4,953,612 43	$2,446,476 93

The following table will show the net earnings over operating expenses, the interest on the bonded debt of the company outstanding, and the surplus of earnings over expenses and interest on bonded debt, for each year from the commencement to the present time:

Years.	Net earnings.	Interest on bonded debt.	Surplus of net earnings over interest.
1864	$46,871 91		$46,872 00
1865	280,272 39	$102,111 00	178,161 00
1866	664,206 96	125,380 00	538,827 00
1867	1,087,901 22	277,140 00	810,761 00
1868	1,469,776 36	995,010 00	474,766 00

1870*	3,800,761 34	1,834,930 00	1,965,831 00
1871*	5,171,192 95	2,884,414 00	2,286,779 00
1872*	7,290,019 84	3,554,299 00	3,735,721 00
Total	22,402,499 97	10,857,634 00	11,544,865 00

*The amounts in the above table, prior to and including the year 1869, are all in gold. For 1870, 1871, and 1872, for greater convenience in exhibiting results, the earnings and expenses (which are partly in currency and partly in gold) and the interest payments (which are in gold) are all stated at their currency value by adding to the amounts received and paid in gold the average premium for the year.

These profits are drawn from the people, who have in reality themselves built the road. And a great part of these profits are derived by extortionate discriminations against the people of the State I represent—discriminations in fares and freights that operate against us in our local traffic both ways, toward the east and toward the west; for it is cheaper to send freight from Chicago to San Francisco than from Chicago to Reno, 292 miles nearer, and it is cheaper to send freights from San Francisco to Ogden than from San Francisco to Elko, 275 miles nearer.

This policy of discrimination is fully admitted. No better argument could possibly be made in favor of the bill under consideration than the reply of Governor Stanford, president of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, to a letter of inquiry recently addressed to him by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce. Upon this point Governor Stanford says:

The policy of all transportation companies, when in the presence of competition, is to take goods very low, and sometimes with no profit margin whatever, rather than not to take them at all. San Francisco being considered as the terminus of a long line of railway from New York, Chicago, or other large cities, also holds the enviable position of being the terminus of numerous sea-routes, and hence is a competitive point. This being a fact, and being desirous of building up our overland business, we finally prevailed upon our eastern connections to waive their claims to their own usual charges on their own individual roads, and to join in the authorizing of agents in the large cities to receive goods and ship direct to San Francisco at a very low rate to meet competition by sea, each road taking but a pro rata of such through rate as compensation for hauling the cars and work done. At first this privilege was conceded alone to San Francisco on account of her position, all overtures by us on behalf of other points being for a long time steadily refused; for what is really the simple reason that such points in California, not having the advantages of competition by sea, had no more claims in the estimation of eastern roads to the exceptional advantages of the low through rate than their own business, which was through to them.

We have finally secured for three other points a recognition as through points, viz., Sacramento, Marysville, and San José; but all further concessions in our State have been resisted, and to-day it stands as a fact that any goods shipped from New York, Chicago, &c., direct to Reno, Stockton, or any point other than the four cities named, are sent way-billed with the ordinary through charges of each road over which they may pass. Shippers, understanding this fact, now rarely ship direct to the place of destination when other than the cities named, but prefer to take advantage of and to profit by the exceptionally low rate forced by the sea traffic, by first shipping to one of these four points, and then reship, by the payment of our usual local rate, to the final point of destination. In this way the aggregate charges are very much lower than though the goods had been sent direct at the local rates to which they were legitimately subject.

You may, perhaps, see from this, that instead of these arrangements being any proper source of complaint, the advantages which all local points in our State derive from having their tonnage delivered to them at the rates secured to the larger cities alone, by reason of their exceptional location, plus the local rate therefrom, should not be so persistently thrust in the background; and it seems to be proper to remember here that the building of the overland railroad did not and cannot change immediately California's generally isolated condition; and our claims upon the eastern system of railroads, for all of the benefits of their lower rates, can only be met for the present through our well-known and largest center, all other points receiving only such concessions as their positions apparently entitle them to. As fast as we can induce our eastern connections to recognize other points in this State as entitled to the benefits of the through rates, we shall do so, and trust soon to announce that Stockton will be added to the list. So far as Reno is concerned, it is out of reach of any competitive advantages, and by its position has no claims whatever to profit by the benefits conferred upon San Francisco or Sacramento.

It would undoubtedly be the duty of the commissioners provided for in this bill to see that eastern roads should recognize something more than four terminal or "competing" points along a road of twelve hundred and twenty-two miles in length!

As regards the "competition by sea" above referred to, it has had a most ruinous and destructive effect upon the local trade of Nevada. In order that through freights from New York to San Francisco, and from San Francisco to New York, might successfully maintain "competition by sea," all way freight from either of those cities to Elko, to Wadsworth, to Reno, to Carson, to Virginia City, has been charged up in corresponding degree to make good the loss on such through freights.

The railroad commissioners of Massachusetts, in speaking of the failure of competition to equalize and reduce the cost of transportation in Illinois, have stated the case under consideration exactly. They say:

Competition, instead of producing uniformity, cheapness, and stability in transportation, led to precisely opposite results; in place of uniformity, it led to gross inequalities between competing and non-competing points; in place of cheapness, it led to alternations of liberality and extortion; and in place of stability, it led to violence and fluctuation.

Mr. Charles Francis Adams, jr., a member of that board of commissioners, in a very able speech before a committee of the Legislature, says further on this point:

In this State of Massachusetts, since I have been a commissioner, a railroad superintendent has frankly acknowledged to me that, when freight was shipped and paid for to the end of his line, if that freight was switched off at a non-competing point but ten miles from where it came on to his line and a hundred miles short of its paid destination, he always charged the car containing that freight twenty dollars extra— twenty dollars for not hauling it a hundred miles; and he justified his extortion. He said his road must live, and that if he had to haul for cost to competing points he must get double profits out of points which could not compete; "or," he added, "if people prefer, I will carry their freight by their doors to the point to which it is paid, a hundred miles farther on, and then haul it back to them at local rates." In other words, gentlemen—and this fact will bear some degree of reflection—while the result of ordinary competition is to reduce and equalize prices, the result of railroad competition is to produce local inequalities, and to arbitrarily raise and depress prices. And yet, the working of this system, this necessary and avowed mixture of pure monopoly with systematic combination, is continually compared, by men who profess to think, with the production of boots and cotton cloth!

Take a few examples of these unjust discriminations, taken from the vast number that are presented all over the country.

Not long since, probably now, goods could be sent from New York to Indiana for 25 cents per one hundred pounds, when the freight from Rochester to the same State was $1 to $1.25. One firm had paid $1.30 per hundred from Rochester to Hannibal, Missouri; while at the same time the same class of freight was moved from Worcester, Massachusetts, to Hannibal for 60 cents, and from Philadelphia for 45 cents.

Rocky Mountain coal, which is selling in San Francisco at $14 per ton, brings $22.50 at Virginia City, Nevada, which is two hundred and fifty miles nearer the mines. At Elko, which is over six hundred miles nearer the mines, the same coal is $15 per ton.

The Central Pacific Railroad Company charges two and a half cents per pound for carrying wool from San Francisco to New York, and charges four cents per pound from Winnemucca, and other places in Central Nevada, three hundred or four hundred miles nearer its destination. The wool-growers of the valleys of that part of Nevada actually find it more to their interest to ship their clip from Winnemucca, three hundred and seventy-five miles, to San Francisco, and then from San Francisco back through Winnemucca, than to pay the rates exacted from Winnemucca direct to New York or Boston!

This company transports freight from San Francisco even to the end of its road, at Ogden, at less rates than to Elko, two hundred and seventy-five miles nearer.

Touching rates of fare over the Pacific roads, it has been claimed that they are less than on any other railroad in the country. The fact is they are greater than on any other railroad in the world. The following table has been compiled from authentic sources:

Rates for one hundred miles in Europe:

In Belgium	$1 56
In Italy	2 52
In Spain	2 82
In Prussia	3 12
In Denmark	3 12
In Austria	3 12
In France	3 20
In Norway	3 20
In Switzerland	3 24
In Holland	3 26
In Portugal	3 40
In Russia	3 46
	36 02

Rates for one hundred miles in America:

Boston and Maine Railroad	$2 75
Erie	3 00
Pennsylvania Central	3 50
Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago	3 40
Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul	3 75
Louisville, New Albany and Chicago	4 00
Ohio and Mississippi	4 00
Mississippi, Kansas and Texas	5 00
Mobile and Ohio	5 00
Nashville and Chattanooga	5 00
East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia	4 50
Richmond and Danville	4 50
	48 40

Rates over the Pacific roads from Omaha to Sacramento are, per one hundred miles, $5.63. And these are railroads built by the people and for the people!

We hear much loose and random talk about the danger of centralization if the Government shall undertake the regulation of this species of interstate commerce by railroad. "Centralization!" Where do we find centralization now but in the hands of a few—even so few as a half-dozen—railroad despots, who hold sway with arbitrary and more than imperial power over the interests of the entire people? Centralization is now in the hands of corporations which by combination have become more powerful than the people. Look to this power!

Poor's Railway Manual for 1873 gives a summary of 57,000 miles of railroad, with liabilities amounting to upward of $3,000,000,000. Their gross earnings were $473,000,000—sums largely in excess of the Government debt and revenue. All this immense sum is capable of being controlled by a directory of the fewest men. On all questions where railroad interests conflict with the interests of the people the influence of this wealth is a unit against the people. In the nervous language of another—

It is the organized, well-disciplined, and well-equipped army against the unorganized, unarmed, and unofficered militia. It employs great armies of men in operating the various lines of road. It is the best customer of the press; it controls the telegraph lines; has the readiest access to the public ear, and is the all-powerful abettor or the terrible foe to political aspirations. Many of our laws are made in its interest, and along every line of railway it keeps in its employ the best legal talent. These men become our judges, and having been educated to view laws relating to railway matters from a railway stand-point, naturally interpret difficult points in its favor. A railroad corporation is soulless, and yet immortal. Wiser than philosophy, it has found in a perpetual charter the elixir of life. When our fathers abolished the law of primogeniture they supposed the country was secure against the evils of vast individual wealth accumulating from generation to generation, because the certainty of death would bring certainty of destruction. But a perpetual charter, granted without consideration, has become a spindle to twist the gossamer thread across the chasm of death. All this vast and constantly increasing wealth is under irresponsible control. A corporation can neither be hung nor sent to the penitentiary; that is to say, there is an entire absence of individual responsibility. Vigorous, alert, all-powerful and perpetual, it only needs unscrupulous managers to become a worse tyrant than Nero, a more dangerous master than Robespierre. Therefore we claim that it is necessary to counteract this great tendency toward a centralization of power through the machinery of the national Government; it is the only power which the present powerful monopolies cannot oppose and overcome.

If we, sir, are to have a centralization of power ruling us, let it be a centralization of power under a government regulated by law, instituted by the people, and in some measure subserving their interests.

Mr. ORR. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported to the House from the Committee on Railways and Canals, and now under consideration, has for its object the regulation and control of that part of the trade, business, or intercourse of the country carried on by means of railroads, and the interchange of commodities between different communities which may properly be designated as commerce.

It is intended to remedy an abuse long known to exist, affecting more or less every portion of the country and every business interest, the consumer as well as the producer, and to hold in wholesome check the prevalent tendency of capital employed in railroad investments toward concentration, in large masses, for the purpose of subverting the general interests of the people, and placing itself beyond their power of control, and rendering smaller and individual interests subservient and tributary to it.

The self-evident necessity for this, or some similar measure, is apparent to every candid person who will carefully and thoughtfully study the present industrial and financial condition of the country, and contemplate the unnatural spectacle presented by a languishing and paralyzed trade, especially that interest whose mission is a productive one, to furnish the commodities which are usually denominated necessaries, and form the basis of subsistence—the nourishment of the nation.

No country in the world known to history has ever, in a more eminent degree, possessed the elements of wealth, prosperity, and power than ours, and yet the tendency to a concentration of capital in the hands of a few, and a combination of interests, and especially those engaged in the carrying trade, into one mass, to be wielded and controlled by one management, regardless of the general welfare, is an alarming symptom of impending danger to our industrial pursuits and threatened paralysis of the productive power of the country. It indicates the existence of a wrong somewhere, an improper arrangement of the running machinery, a want of balance between the wealth-producing forces of the Government, and demands at the hands of Congress a remedy; and in such emphatic and positive terms does the demand come that we cannot well afford to allow it to remain unheeded.

That the passage of this or any similar bill will prove a corrective of all the evils of which the people complain, and remove at once from their shoulders all the burdens that are now borne with so much discomfort, I do not contend. But that the adoption of the principle that commerce by railroad, when carried on between the States, is subject to the same congressional control and regulation that it is when carried on by other means, and a denial by positive law of the erroneous theory that for want of authority in the Constitution expressed in positive and direct terms applicable to railroads, the exercise by Congress of any control over that kind of commerce is an infringement of the Constitution, will be beneficial to the country, and that the assertion of such power in Congress by some act declarative of that principle and the organization of the proper machinery for the prompt enforcement of a law made in support of that view, would result in the diminution of the burdens complained of, I think there is no room left for doubt.

In the early settlement of this country, no question such as confronts us to-day could arise, for the reason that the grain-producing area extended but a short distance from the sea-board, no portion of it being far remote from some port offering convenient facilities for the shipment abroad of any of its surplus productions, and to reach which no one portion possessed very decided advantages over the other portions, the same means being open to all, and to all was denied the advantage of canal and railroad transportation, and in fact any means superior to common wheeled vehicles and the primitive wagon-road.

Such was the condition of the country with regard to its interior carrying trade when the Constitution was formed, and the provision made in that instrument for the regulation of commerce "with foreign nations and between the States," that it had its first application almost exclusively to water-routes, and to ocean traffic, and to an internal trade very inconsiderable, and beset with difficulties the most embarrassing and dangers the most discouraging.

Instructed by the lessons taught under the Confederation, and with full knowledge of the difficulties which had been experienced upon this subject, the framers made its provisions broad enough to avoid the difficulties from which it was desirable to escape, and comprehensive enough to provide for a commerce of any volume or magnitude, whether carried on by ocean, lake, or river, or when it was transferred to a canal or railroad.

As the agricultural lands filled up and became peopled, the new immigration moved gradually though rapidly westward, carrying the center of production with it and away from the sea-board; and thus approaches to the ports of shipment, and connections with them, became more difficult, and often under such difficulties the prices of agricultural products fell below the cost of production and became drugs in the market and burdens to the producers.

To palliate this evil, however, a large volume of immigration was constantly arriving upon our shores, distributing itself over our agricultural regions, and forcing the center of production still further westward; and as these accessions to the population could not at once become producers by reason of the time necessary to open farms and prepare them for crops, they had of necessity to buy the grain of their neighbors until they could produce it for themselves, thus furnishing a home market for the surplus grain of the interior.

That portion of the immigration which did not seek farms and go to the interior, but became residents of cities and manufacturing towns which had not yet become very remote from any portion of the rural districts, nor very difficult to reach by them, also became potent agencies in relieving the country from the burdens incident to remote markets and insufficient means of transportation.

This volume of immigration not only continued but increased with each year, and the agricultural area rapidly enlarged, the "star of empire" took its way westward, and the seat of production which went with it would soon have passed beyond the possibility of carrying its surplus to the sea-board by the old methods of transportation. But that necessity which is the "mother of invention" invoked her powers to provide a cheaper and more expeditious method of transit.

The construction of a system of wagon-roads leading into this agricultural country from each of the principal cities on the coast was the first device of each to retain to itself the trade of that growing region, and consequently Philadelphia and Baltimore each became the focal point of such a system of roads, while New York, through the medium of the Hudson River, controlled the large area of country watered by that stream in the north and west of it, which floated to it their products in the rude crafts known in that time. These methods were soon outgrown by the rapidly expanding settlements, and the productive territory became so far removed from the sea-board that they became inadequate as a means of transportation, and did not meet the demands of a country thus situated.

The Erie Canal was then projected and pushed forward to completion, and with it came a revolution in the carrying trade with the West. The distant grain-producing districts were practically moved into a closer proximity to the ocean. Measured by the cost of transportation, the distance between Lake Erie and New York had been diminished by more than 100 per cent. This proposition to connect the lake with the Hudson had been by conservative minds regarded as chimerical, the emanation of a highly romantic and excited imagination, invoking the contempt of those who possessed minds too feeble and a courage too faint to conceive or project an enterprise of such magnitude.

Cheaper and more expeditious transportation was an admitted necessity. The cost of moving a ton of freight from Pittsburgh or the lake to New York was seventy dollars, which upon the greater part of the commodities sold by the farmer was prohibitory. He was too far from the consumer to effect exchanges at such a rate; but the method of relief proposed was so gigantic in its proportions, involving an expenditure in such disproportion to the wealth of the country and State, that it challenged the incredulity of the stubborn and the fears of the timid.

At that time the State of New York had a population of less than a million of souls, with a permanent annual revenue of less than $300,000, with its expenditures fully up to its receipts, while the estimated cost of this work was $5,000,000.

Although nothing short of a pressing necessity could compel the hazard of an undertaking so gigantic, yet the wise and sagacious statesmen of that day were not ignorant of its importance. One of its friends and advocates, full of hope of its completion, in a letter to a friend in Europe, pending the consideration of the measure, prognosticating upon the effects of the work upon the interior, used language so enthusiastic that he was thought to overstate the probability, as much as it was demonstrated in after years he had actually fallen short of the truth, when he said:

> Hundreds of large ships will at no distant day bound on the billows of these inland seas.
> Shall I lead your astonishment up to the verge of incredulity? I will. Know, then, that one-tenth part of the expense borne by Britain in the last campaign would enable ships to sail from London, through Hudson River, into Lake Erie. As yet, we only crawl along the outer shell of our country. The interior excels the part we inhabit in soil, in climate, in everything.

The great man who used such prophetic language possessed a vision which penetrated far beyond that of most men of his time, and a conception which grasped the empire to be made out of the then new and unoccupied West, but he failed to realize the whole extent of the probability, because those powerful agents in accomplishing the facts as they now exist, the steamboat and railroad system, had neither of them been invented and could not enter into his computation.

The work was completed, and all and more than its originators claimed for it was accomplished. The interior was rapidly developed. Its surplus produce, before excluded, began to flow eastward to New York, and interchanges began between the sections at greatly reduced cost. The contest between the Atlantic cities for the control of western trade was decided. New York had assured to it the ascendency over all its rivals. Not only was trade compelled to pass through that channel, but it became the basis upon which other systems of internal improvement were constructed, which gathered for its benefit and advantage.

That part of our carrying trade known as interstate commerce received a great impetus with the completion of this work. The connection by water was complete between New York and the great lakes. Commerce, no longer willing to be confined to the ocean and to crawl along our coast, had leaped State lines, and was pushing forward to the interior, and the time had come to test the wisdom of the constitutional provision for the regulation of commerce between the States; and that it could be done upon the rivers and lakes has, I believe, never been denied.

Following that great improvement, soon came the railroad system, effecting a greater revolution in the carrying trade than all the improvements which preceded it. With a growth so rapid that in a space of only a few years it has appropriated to itself almost the entire inland commerce of the country, its lines now aggregate about sixty thousand miles of road. It penetrates into every portion of our vast country, employs a capital of $3,000,000,000, controls a vast army of operatives and employés, and their gross receipts for the year 1872 amounted to $475,000,000, a sum greater in amount than the entire revenue of the national Government. And yet this vast amount of capital has, by successful manipulation and combination, been reduced to the management and control of a few men, and is, we are informed by the opposers of this bill, above and beyond the power of congressional regulation.

If this be true, then the provision of the Constitution which enables Congress to regulate commerce between the States becomes useless as soon as the great opportunity for using it for the accomplishment of practical good arrives.

Had the framers of the Constitution intended the provision to apply only to the commerce carried on by the methods then known, very little necessity existed for covering by it any other than foreign commerce. As long as the internal trade was prosecuted by the old means, by the wagon-road, by the canal, or even after the introduction of railroads, when it was confined to short lines, each operating under its own separate management and in competition with its rivals, the necessity of resorting to congressional interference scarcely arose, and the power, although existing in the Constitution, was latent and hardly need be invoked.

If this estimate of constitutional power be the correct one, then the internal commerce of this country eludes legislative control just at the time when it becomes dangerous by reason of its possession of vast capital and extent, and when safety would dictate the exercise of such power over it.

At the time of the adoption of the Constitution the entire commerce of the nation, compared with what it is now, was of the utmost insignificance. Yet it was of such importance that its separate and exclusive control by the several States was so conflicting and productive of so much danger, that such a change of system as would place the control of the commercial interests in the hands of the General Government and reduce it to one management became a prime necessity. The leading object sought was to secure in Congress the power to regulate not only commerce with foreign nations, but among the States—to remove from it the embarrassments consequent upon the conflicting action of so many different legislative bodies, and place it under the control and make it amenable to one authority, and governed by one uniform law.

A surrender of the powers which, under the Confederation, had been exercised by the States, was necessary to procure harmonious action, under which alone commerce could live.

The abandonment of that divided system which made each State the competitor of the others for foreign trade and its victim in domestic trade, and made the new States remote from the sea-board tributary to those States which possessed a shipping port, were primary and leading objects in the adoption of the Constitution. And if the objections to this bill, based upon constitutional grounds, are valid, it would seem that the transfer of the carrying trade from the common road and the lake and canal to the railroad, had made a return to that system of conflicting and embarrassing State control and legislation under which so many difficulties arose, and from which we had hoped we had been safely delivered, inevitable.

Commerce, to-day, does not differ from what it was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; and whether carried on by the means used at that time, the sail-boat, common wagon, or canal-boat, or by the more modern and expeditious inventions, the steamboat or railroad, it is still the commerce which the Constitution sought to regulate.

Commerce is defined by a writer of considerable reputation to be "the interchange of commodities, whether manufactures or agricultural products, for money or for other commodities."

The same writer makes more clear this definition in his account of its origin. He says:

Its origin must be ascribed to the period when man first acquired the idea of property so perfectly as to be acquainted with the most simple of all contracts, that of exchanging by barter one rude commodity for another.

The wants and ingenuity of his nature would then readily suggest to him a new method of increasing his enjoyments by disposing of what was superfluous in his own stores in order to procure what was necessary or desirable in those of other men.

A commercial intercourse would thus begin and gradually spread to neighboring tribes, but no important interchange could take place between contiguous districts, whose soil and climate being nearly the same, would yield similar productions; and as remote countries could not carry on a very extensive intercourse by land, the progressive extension of commerce could take place only in those states that cultivated the art of navigation.

Commerce, as thus defined, is the same in all periods, and however carried on; but as water communication was so long the only means by which any considerable use could be made of it, and that being the case when it was brought under congressional control, it may be well understood how the power conferred was so often misunderstood as only intended to regulate navigation.

The First Congress passed laws in which it asserted its power not only over persons engaged in commerce, but over the instruments used by them in its prosecution. It required masters of vessels to be citizens of the United States; established rules for the government of officers and seamen; and recognized by the general tenor and logic of its legislation, the views I have expressed, that trade and intercourse, whether between this and foreign countries, or between the different parts of this Government, whether carried on by water or upon land, is commerce within the meaning of the provision above cited. The same construction which would prevent its application to railroads would prevent its application to steamboats, for neither had at that time been used in commerce.

Congress has uniformly enacted laws for the regulation of steamboats, prescribed their kinds, construction, and equipments, and prescribed qualifications for pilots and engineers, the kind of signals to be used, put limitations upon the number of passengers to be carried; in short, every regulation requisite for the safety and comfort of passengers, and for the sure and rapid transmission of freight. It has prevented by law the obstruction of navigable streams, and removed from such streams obstructions already existing; widened and deepened the mouths of rivers and harbors, and has always required its assent to be given to the construction of any bridge across a navigable stream.

The authority for the exercise of all this power is found in the provision for the regulation of commerce. Since the advent of railroads a large majority of the interchanges between sections are made by that means; and we are told that by this change of route commerce escapes the regulation and control by Congress, which it is admitted would have been in its power without such transfer; and that whether you can be protected by Congress in the carrying of your goods or not depends upon the kind of agents you select for their transmission, although according to the highest authority it is commerce in either case.

In this view I am sustained by the highest judicial authority; and, as furnishing a complete answer upon this question, I refer to the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller, in the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge Company, which, although so often cited in this debate, I beg leave to quote in connection with my remarks:

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce, because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce as well as when carried on by water, and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in the one case as in the other. The "commerce among the States," spoken of in the Constitution, must, at the time that instrument was adopted, have been mainly of this character, for the steamboat, which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers, was then unknown.

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted, a means by which merchandise is transported across States and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has, with great benefit, been subject to the control of salutary congressional legislation, because it is an instrument of commerce. Is there any reason why the other should not? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that where these roads become parts of great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States; and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government. As already intimated, the shackles with which the different States fettered commerce in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present Constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce, since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the Federal Government, has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of that commerce again to the control of the States, and to the consequent vexations and burdens which the States may impose through whose territories it must be carried on? And must all this be permitted because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the Constitution was framed?

For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

It is urged that this power is exclusively in the States, and that the application of the contrary rule will unsettle the theories of the fathers on this subject, and reverse the established and well-settled doctrine of eminent domain. I have no disposition to deny the right of eminent domain, nor the power to charter and regulate corporations within a State, including the power of taxation and local control; but it is when railroads cease to limit their operations to the jurisdiction in which they were created, and become portions of through lines, with a combined property spanning a continent, and carrying commodities from State to State, that they grow out of the power of State regulation, and become liable to that control by Congress which is conferred upon it by the clause in the Constitution from whence comes its power to regulate commerce among the States.

If railroad property, thus massed and combined, is beyond the power of the national Legislature, how deplorable is the condition of the country! Examine this picture.

There are to-day sixty thousand miles of railroad in operation in the United States, the larger part of which have entered into the formation of through trunk lines or are branches to them.

The capital used in their construction and operation exceeds that used in any other interest in the country capable of combination.

It is a power dangerous from its vastness alone, and, when used by skillful hands and directed to one common purpose, rides down and tramples out all efforts at competition, and holds at its mercy the business interests of the country. Instead of being disseminated among the people and identified with them, it enthrones itself in Wall street, whence its decrees emanate.

It dictates the carrying rate for theentire country, and discriminates against points incapable of offering a troublesome competition; but if not successful in this, it sends out agents commissioned to exterminate any enterprise likely to become disagreeable in that way.

It has reduced the control of this vast aggregation of power into the hands of a few persons, who, unwilling to be limited to a legitimate purpose, sometimes seize the favorable opportunity to grasp the purse-strings, and cause a flow of the currency of the country into unnatural channels created by their own machinery, and thus wring from the poor their legitimate dues for the benefit of themselves.

It holds high carnival in the stock exchange, augments its values by the adoption of a fiction, and gambles upon its prospective profits based upon this false basis.

It has, by the aid of legislation, been exalted above the condition of natural persons, and for its benefit the sacred principle of exclusive ownership of land has been suspended.

It is allowed to appropriate lands of a private citizen, regardless of his attachment to them.

It has carved out of the public domain an empire in extent, and holds it until it chooses to dispose of it.
